Owen is foiled once more, but his resources seem exhaustless. Once more he calls Balthazar to do his nefarious work. This time he hopes to destroy the pair. Knowing Pauline will accompany Harry in the race as his mechanician, Owen and Balthazar induce Ferrari to enter the race and collide with them. Balthazar sprinkles the road with pieces of metal, expecting to cause a blow-out of Harry's tires, which will give Ferrari an opportunity to collide. Fortunately Harry's machine runs off the track, but Ferrari's car, swiftly following, runs into the midst of the metal pieces, puncturing all his tires. With a terrible lurch, the machine turns turtle, pinning Ferrari and his mechanic under the ruins. The crowd rushes to their rescue, but Ferrari has paid for his misdeeds and lies lifeless on the road. Balthazar, pursued by the maddened crowd, makes his escape. Pauline and her lover are spared from the evil scheming of Owen.

This letter is found and read by the banker, who is shocked to learn that Marc would again enter such a dangerous occupation. He protests to Marc, who informs him it would be necessary to make a position in life for himself in order to marry the girl. Marc is delighted and loses no time in telling Louise of their fortune.

THE WARNING (Three Parts).—In spite of the influences of his father, a minister of the Gospel, Lester Goodrich seeks the companionship of fast friends. He makes constant demands on his parents for money, which he squanders. One night he and his comrades repair to a cafe and Lester becomes helpless with drink. His parents wonder at his failure to return. His mother induces her husband to seek him and bring him home. Following a clue, Lester's father finds him at the cafe about to be ejected for not paying his score. Settling the bill, the father returns home with the erring boy and warns him to give up his tempestuous career.

With his father's warning impressed on his mind, he falls into a heavy slumber, in which he has a vivid dream and sees what his life might become, he continues.

Arising from his bed, he goes into his parent's room. Noting their absence, he takes their money and jewels and joins his friends. They go to a gambling resort, which is raided. Lester escapes and returns to his home. Next day, Sunday, his parents start for church. He promises to join them later. He watches until the collection is deposited in the chapel and steals it. His father and mother discover the robbery and find evidence points to their son. Lester, meeting a girl friend, invites her out. He rows her to a lonely spot in the lake and attempts to embrace her. Endeavoring to evade him, she falls into the water and is drowned. The tragedy is seen by those on shore. One man pursues Lester on a motor cycle. In the struggle, Lester kills his antagonist. Cornered by the pursuers, he attempts to escape by swimming but is caught by the police in a boat. He succeeds in escaping by a ruse, but is arrested at his home.

He is brought to trial for murder, convicted and receives a long sentence. One day, while working with the convicts he and another escape after attempting to kill the guards. Lester returns home for funds to enable him to leave the country. He is heard by his father, who overcomes him after a struggle. Horrified to see the prisoner is his son, the minister decides to take the law in his own hands. Lifting the bound prisoner upon his shoulder, he carries him to the lake, the scene of Lester's crimes. There he compels him to kneel. Raising his hands to the Almighty, the minister asks for strength to fulfill his mission and prays for the soul of the boy. Dashing the tears from his eyes, the father casts his son into the lake. Simultaneously with the fall Lester awakes and finds himself on the floor. Bewildered by his dream, Lester hastens to his parents and tells them of his awful experience, promising he will lead a better life.

THE BROKEN PROMISE (Four Parts).—Inge, an orphan, is employed by a well-to-do fisherman in a small village. As is customary, she is treated as one of the family. Jan, the son of the fisherman, falls in love with her and wins her. His mother has other aspirations for her boy. The girl's lover is approached by his neighbors, who engage in smuggling, and is told he can make money by joining them. He yields and casts his lot with theirs. Inge, seeing them leave in their motor boat to meet a smuggling vessel, requests to be taken along and is granted. The contraband goods are no sooner removed from the vessel to their motor boat than they are pursued by the revenue men. The young fisherman and his companions have barely landed when the revenue cutter overhauls them. The young men escape among the cliffs and are pursued. Meantime, Inge has escaped with the motor boat and signals the smugglers from the water. By her assistance the smugglers escape the revenue men and return.

Jan is informed by his father of the receipt of a letter from the magistrate of the place, calling attention to Jan's engagement to his daughter and that it is only because of the engagement that he has refrained from foreclosing a mortgage on his home. Alarmed by the threat Jan's father takes him to the magistrate's house and plans for a speedy marriage.

Meantime, Inge informs Jan's mother he has promised to marry her, and she is an expectant mother. Infuriated, the old woman turns her out of the house. The poor girl seeks refuge with her aunt. Jan refuses to have anything to do with her, even when the baby is born.

The day of the wedding arrives. Jan is driving his father and mother to the magistrate's house. Inge tries to stop him and listen to one last plea. He refuses and strikes her with his whip. Inge goes to the revenue inspectors and tells them of the cave where the smugglers store their goods, revealing the guilt of Jan. She soon repents this and informs one of Jan's friends that the revenue men are on his trail. Arriving a few minutes before the revenue men at the magistrate's house the friend warns the bridegroom-to-be and the wedding guests see with consternation Jan leave in haste, while the final words of the ceremony are yet to be pronounced.

Inge meets Jan, takes him to a sail boat, and together they escape. Pursued by the revenue cutter, they fail to stop and Jan is shot down. Left without any one at the tiller, the little boat is capsized, and the girl and her betrayer drown in each other's arms.

THE COUNT THAT TOOK THE COUNT.—Henry Newrich reads that the Count de Bloomer has arrived at the hotel De Luxe and it is reported he is in search of an heiress. As he has aspirations for a titled addition to his family, he invites the count to dine with him that day. When young Harry Smith, who is in love with the daughter and she with him, asks Newrich for the girl's hand, the father refuses, saying she must marry into the nobility.

Meantime the count, walking in the park, meets Mike Sullivan under the influence of liquor. He gets into an altercation with Mike and gives him his card. Later while the Irishman is sleeping on a park bench a policeman sees the card sticking in his pocket and, thinking he is the count, takes him to the hotel.

Thus begins a mixup in identity which lasts until Mr. Newrich, thoroughly disgusted with the count, consents to the marriage between his daughter and young Smith.

TRUE FEATURES.

TRAPPED BY CAMERA (Four Parts).—An elderly gentleman, a professor and savant, living in quiet retirement is greatly mystified and annoyed by a nightly visitor, who sits through his study and rummages around his desk. In his growing embarrassment the professor appeals to the police, who make a thorough search of the professor's apartments, but fail to discover even the faintest clue to the solution of the mystery. Thereupon the professor appeals to the master detective to the brilliant and profound Stuart Webb, who can fathom the motives of men and follow the devious paths of the criminal. At first, however, Webb is puzzled as much as the police were. After much thinking he hits upon a novel plan which he hopes will bring good results. He installs a motion picture camera in the professor's haunted chamber and by a most ingenious device arranges the machinery in such a way that the slightest touch of the desk sets off a flashlight and puts the camera into action at the same time. The plan succeeds to this extent: The detective now has a picture of the strange intruder. The latter is revealed by the film as a man with a big beard. Rightly concluding that the man of mystery would want to change his appearance as quickly as possible after being caught by the camera and would therefore go to the first barber shop to effect the change, Webb and his assistant are ready. The mysterious intruder sits down in a chair and when he is lathered and Webb holds the razor poised above his head, Webb's assistant slips the handcuffs on him. Now, the veil of the mystery lifts rapidly. The midnight visitor, it turns out, was not after the professor's desk at all; he was the agent of a foreign government in search of important plans. These plans were in the possession of a famous military engineer, who lived on the floor above the professor. There were secret passages in the old house and in the confusion of the winding steps the thief had mistaken the professor's study for the room of the engineer. The discovery that the whole house was mined, so to speak, with parallel stairs and shafts is brought home to the spectator with unique and startling effect.

WARNER'S FEATURES.

THE ADVENTURES OF KITTY COBB (Four Parts).—Kitty Cobb had longings for the big city which she had never seen. One day Kitty met a young civil engineer, Bob Caldecott, on his way to the fort near her home with secret plans. He took her riding in his auto and entertained her with stories of the great metropolis. Bob finally left her at her gate and drove away. But Kitty was restless afterwards, and started to wander over the fields towards the fort. Suddenly she stopped. Before her were three suspicious-looking characters with cameras. They seemed to be taking photographs of the fortifications. Creeping closer, she overheard their conversation. They were spies. Kitty started to run home, but the spies discovered her and gave chase. She outdistanced them, however, and had just time to telephone the fort when the men entered her home, jerked her away from the 'phone and bound her father, mother and herself to chairs, then they fled.

Bob and the Colonel came to the rescue. Young Caldecott devoted himself to comforting Kitty. The yearning to live in the city grew upon her as a result of Bob's visit, and she importuned her parents to permit her to go and find work. After long urging they at last reluctantly consented.

Her early experiences were not encouraging. She could not get anything to do, and in a short time was down to her last cent. After barely escaping being turned out on the streets of New York for not paying her board, through the efforts of a fellow boarder—a kind-hearted woman—she secured a position as usher in the Globe theater.

One night at the theater a young top presumed to force his attentions upon her. A lovely old lady, richly gowned, overheard his remarks and interfered.

As she was talking to Kitty, who should come up and address her as mother but Bob. Kitty and Bob recognized each other at once, and the result was that Mrs. Caldecott made Kitty her secretary.

One day Count Pulaski, Bob's sister's fiance, was introduced to Kitty. He was none other than the infamous villain whom she had discovered taking pictures of the fortifications. Quick as a flash Kitty saw through the count's strategem. He was there not because he loved Bob's sister—but to steal the secret plans.

Kitty hastened to the room which Bob had converted into a workshop. She barely concealed the precious drawings when the count also entered the room. Seizing her he wrapped a heavy curtain about her head and lowered her out of a window to his waiting accomplices outside.

It was at this time that Ed. Randall, Kitty's country swain, came to New York. As he was passing through a side street on his way to see Kitty he saw an auto stop in front of a squalid tenement. Two men sprang from it, and carried a struggling figure tied in a curtain into the house.

When Ed reached the Caldecott mansion he found the entire household in dismay over the mysterious fate of Kitty. He related what he had seen. Without a moment's wait he and Bob started for the suspected house.

They gained admittance, but were informed that the girl was not there. As they were about to leave in despair, Bob found Kitty's handkerchief.

Hearing a muffled cry, Bob and his companion dashed upstairs and entered a room. Here Kitty was being held by the count and his confederates. There was a terrific exchange of blows. The count and his forces went down. So did Ed. Randall. Bob seized Kitty and started down the stairs. He was attacked by another of the gang. In the struggle both fell over the balustrade and were rendered unconscious.

A woman confederate recaptured Kitty, just as the count and one of his thugs reappeared on the scene. The girl was bound again. Bob was dragged to a small room, where his captors tossed him, still unconscious, on a bed, turned on the gas, and left him to perish.

Ed, overcome in the battle upstairs, soon regained his senses and started down the fire-escape. He heard Kitty trying to beat down a boarded window on the floor below. He battered it in and rescued her. But Kitty would not go without her Bob. The two returned to the house. After a short search Ed found Bob and carried him into the air. But before they could make their escape the count and his followers returned to the attack. Kitty battled her way to the street and obtained the aid of the police. That was the end of Count Pulaski.

There was a great reunion at the Caldecott mansion that evening to celebrate the return of Kitty. And as for Bob—well, Miss Cobb became Mrs. Bob.

FALSE PRIDE HAS A FALL (Three Parts—Albuquerque).—The day that Ellen "graduated" from the little red school house near her father's farm, everybody said she was destined for a great career. So when her teacher suggested that a "finishing school" ought to come next, Ellen proceeded to cajole pa and ma into putting their O. K. on the idea. She won out, and duly started to a fashionable girl's school. Pa went with her. Everybody seemed to know right off that they were from the country. But after a few mishaps they boarded a taxi-cab and were whirled away to the school.

A maid whose smile seemed to become chronic at sight of Pa and Ellen, ushered them into the drawing room. Pa promptly pre-empted a richly upholstered arm-chair and slung his leg over an arm. Ellen annexed the piano with a chortle of joy and hammered out some ragtime. And this was the scene and the sound that greeted the stately principal of the fashionable school when she entered the room.

It failed to make a hit with her. Pa dug down into his jeans and produced a roll of yellowbacks not quite as thick as his arm. Ellen was accepted for the "finishing" process.

Ellen's first evening at the school passed off pleasantly enough, barring such trivialities as upsetting the soup into her lap, bumping into the principal and giving some of the other girls hysterics. But that night Ellen was hazed.

A dozen or more nightgowned beauties arose from their beds after Ellen had gone to sleep, seized her bodily, blindfolded her, carried her to the bathroom and dumped her into a tub of icy water.

In spite of these experiences, however, Ellen retained her sunny good nature, quickly winning the cordial friendship of all the girls.

Furthermore, Ellen's "finish" proved to be a decided success.

The young ladies of the school boarded a steamer one day on pleasure bent. Ellen was there, of course. That was the beginning of things, for Ellen fell overboard. The young man who rescued her was handsome and rich. They were married, and Ellen found herself installed in a very beautiful home with a very select circle of friends.

Pa and Ma could not attend the wedding, because Pa got laid up showing the boys how to ride a bucking pony. But as soon as he recovered they decided to visit Ellen and make it a surprise. They duly arrived, looking the perfect picture of backwoods rusticity.

"And my first reception to-night!" thought Ellen.

In her new environments Ellen developed a bad case of false pride. Now she shrunk from exhibiting the old folks to her new friends. So she at once decided to get them to bed early, before her guests arrived. Her scheme worked all right until the dancing started. That aroused Pa. Seizing his trusty six-shooter, he and Ma stole downstairs to investigate, clad only in their nighties.

Ellen fortunately discovered them on the stairway and drove them back to their rooms. But Pa and Ma, who were now thoroughly alive to the good time they were missing, decided to go downstairs again and join the merrymakers. So dressing hastily, they presented themselves to the astonished assembly.

They entered with energy into the festivities. Pa seized a society belle.

The guests were thrown into a panic. Ellen after vainly trying to explain fainted from mortification. The guests left with much suppressed laughter. Ellen, reviving, turned upon the old couple, accusing them of disgracing her.

In great grief, Pa and Ma at once packed their grips and were about to leave, when Ellen, having grown calmer, caught a glimpse of their sad and crestfallen faces.

She sank to her knees before them and begged the forgiveness which was freely granted. A year later there were great doings at the old farm house. Ellen was there.

THE HYPNOTIC VIOLINIST (Three Parts—Danmark).—Dr. Crampton, a distinguished eye specialist, and his wife were dining in a fashionable restaurant, where a gypsy orchestra was playing under the leadership of Zigo, the famous hypnotic violinist.

Facing the diners to acknowledge their applause, the musician's deepset eyes fell upon the doctor's wife. Struck by her beauty, a desire to possess her overwhelmed him. He stepped down from the platform and playing his violin wildly, moved slowly among the guests, stopping here and there to take the pieces of money they tossed aside for him.

Suddenly the woman felt a strange sense of uneasiness stealing over her. She turned and found Zigo at her side. His eyes met hers. With a terror-stricken expression upon her face, she involuntarily threw her arms up before her as if to ward off an unseen foe, then fell back into her chair in fear and trembling.

Her husband in alarm sprang to her aid. Turning he beheld Zigo standing at his side. Thinking that the musician was waiting for money the doctor in anger plunged his hand into his pocket, clutched a few coins and threw them on the table, accidently dropping one of his cards. With an exultant smile Zigo eagerly read the address.

The next day as the doctor was about to leave on his professional calls, Zigo walked into his office stating that he feared he was becoming blind. Examining his eyes, the physician dismissed his complaint as trivial, but warned the violinist that his heart was seriously affected. Then leaving instructions to the wife to give the patient a heart stimulant he departed. He fixed his piercing gaze upon her and in low whispers he commanded her to meet him the following morning. All barriers of resistance broken down, she was lured from her child, her husband and her home to become the creature of this demon's psychic power.

Zigo immediately saw that the woman was the instrument through which a fortune might be made. After months of cruel training his victim, while under the hypnotic spell, could, among many other death-defying feats, walk with ease across the tips of sharp-pointed spears and nothing to protect her naked feet.

The hypnotist and his subject made their debut in a leading theater, and scored phenomenal success. For a while they enjoyed the public's undivided favor. Keeping the unfortunate woman immured from the world when not under his eye, he spent his spare moments in dissipation and gambling. He lost in large amounts upon the gaming table the money which his victim earned for him.

But the public was fickle. In one season the novelty of his performance had worn off and Zigo knocked in vain at doors of the city theaters for engagements. His money gone, he was forced to gain a livelihood by traveling in gypsy fashion from town to town exhibiting in fields and barns.

In their travels they reached a suburb of the victim's native city. Her little daughter who, was accompanying Dr. Crampton on his rounds of visits, was left for a moment alone in her father's carriage. Attracted by the lurid posters announcing the appearance of "Mme. Zigo," the little girl with childish curiosity approached them. She instantly recognized the woman of the poster as her mother, and ran to the barn where the performance was taking place. Rushing up to the woman, the child cried: "Mother, please come home with me."

But she was oblivious to all that was not Zigo's will. In the meanwhile the doctor, missing his daughter, traced her to the barn. His wife was walking in mid-air across rows of glittering spears. With a cry of rage, he darted through the startled crowd. Zigo attacked him with desperate fury, but the doctor knocked him senseless. This caused the mesmeric power that controlled the woman to snap, and with a piercing shriek she plunged headlong to the ground.

Freed from her infamous thralldom; broken in health and spirit, she was restored to her husband and child.

Zigo determined to make an attempt to regain mastery over his former victim. In the still hours of the night he stealthily invaded the invalid's retreat. He awakened her. In horror she marshalled all her strength to resist his power. Slowly her consciousness was ebbing away. His conquest was almost complete, when her husband hearing a noise, rushed into the apartment and sprang at the intruder. The hypnotist was about to grapple with him, when shrinking back, he clutched his heart, swayed unsteadily for a second, and fell lifeless at the doctor's feet.

APEX.

CALLED TO THE FRONT (Four Parts).—The story opens with love scenes between Jim Warrington, a young Secret Service man, and his sweetheart, Ruth Denham. To facilitate communication Warrington has a wireless installed at his home, by which he is able to communicate in private code with Ruth. A declaration of war with Germany gives the Secret Service man opportunities for distinguishing himself. He is sent to the Russian Embassy at St. Petersburg with a dispatch, which after an exciting time he delivers safely, and is entrusted with a reply to deliver to the authorities at home. A German spy learns that Warrington is returning with the dispatch, and he is waylaid, and made a prisoner on a German dreadnought. He is searched, but having hidden the important paper in his boot it is not discovered. On board ship Warrington learns that the German fleet is about to invade the British coast, and he determines to find a way to warn the home authorities. He manages to reach the wireless room, overcome the operator, and dispatch a code message to his sweetheart. Ruth at once warns the authorities, and preparations for Britain's defense are hurriedly completed.

Warrington destroys the wireless apparatus and then jumps into the sea through a porthole and makes his escape despite the efforts of the gunners who open fire upon him. He reaches land on a lonely part of the coast, and falls down exhausted. Recovering he creeps toward a spot where big gun firing is going on, and witnesses a fierce battle between the British troops and the German invaders. The struggle is fierce and long, but at length the British troops, assisted by a naval brigade, who arrive by armored train, drive the invaders from British territory. Once more Warrington falls into the hands of the enemy, and is placed in prison, after some remarkable adventures. The prison is bombarded by British guns and falls in ruins. From the debris Warrington crawls to freedom once more, and securing a revolver from the body of a dead soldier, intercepts two of the enemy tapping the telegraph wires. He shoots them at sight, and with their field instrument manages to send a message through to headquarters giving news of the enemy's designs and his location near the firing line. Ruth determines to go on her motorcycle to the rescue of her lover. After an exciting time she reaches Warrington, and together they return to London where Warrington delivers his precious dispatches to the authorities, and is warmly congratulated upon his bravery. He reports the total failure of the invasion, and we leave the lovers to their well-earned peace after their marvelous experiences with the prospect of a happy wedding when all danger is over.

THE FIENDS OF HELL (Four Parts).—A Chinese Secret Society that has sworn to obtain by fair means of foul all important scientific inventions of the world, sends two fellow conspirators, Li Sun Wu and Wing Chang, to London to endeavor to obtain possession of two inventions that they have heard of, viz: a metal stronger than steel and one-tenth its weight (the inventor of which in order to prove its worth has had an airship made of this steel), the other, the true elements of electricity.

On their arrival in London they take a house next door to that occupied by Rex Omar, a scientific and criminal investigator with wonderful occult powers. The following day they call upon Dr. Wincott Lane, the inventor of the true elements of electricity. He shows them over his laboratory, despite the warning of his daughter, who is suspicious of their intentions. Rex Omar, who has also paid the inventor a friendly visit, overhears the conversation of the Chinamen, and decides to attend the meeting of the Secret Society which they have arranged.

Before leaving his house, he mesmerizes his Hindoo medium, Lola, and places her in front of her magic mirror. Arriving at the Chinese Club, he sandbags the doorkeeper, and takes his place until all the members have arrived. He then attends the meeting, but is discovered by Li Sun Wu. The Chinamen decide upon a cruel revenge, and brings forth their torture clock. Rex Omar's head is placed through an aperture in the clock face, the hands of which are swords as keen as razors. The clock is set going and the hands are seen to gradually go round on their fateful and bloody work.

By means of hypnotic telepathy, he sends a message to Lola, who sees all that is going on at the Chinese Club, and she loses no time in informing the police. Nearer and nearer the fatal hands are getting to the victim's neck, but the police arrive in the nick of time, and affect a rescue.

The Chinamen, however, have not given up their object, and now plan to obtain the model of the airship. John Hartsdale, the inventor, is giving the model a trial flight round his laboratory, and with satisfaction packs it away carefully in the safe. He is, however, watched by envious eyes, which prove to be those of a Chinese spy. As soon as Hartsdale leaves the room, the spy enters, and depositing a drugged newspaper on the table exits quickly by the window. Hartsdale's footman enters the room and commences to read the paper, is overcome and falls prostrate on the floor. The inventor hearing the fall rushes in and is himself slightly overcome.

While the victims are lying on the floor, apparently dead, the Chinamen enter and kidnap Hartsdale, and steal his invention. Lola sees what has happened, and Rex Omar, disguised, waits outside Chinese headquarters until one of the gang comes out in search of a doctor whose services are required to bring Hartsdale to his senses. He directs the Chinaman to one, and by a short cut Rex Omar arrives at the doctor's first.

He is allowed to impersonate the doctor and thus gains admittance to the Chinese Club. The doctor prepares to prescribe for his patient, and taking hold of Hartsdale's wrist taps a message in Morse Code to keep quiet as he is a friend. He informs the Chinamen that the only way of restoring the patient is by means of electricity in high voltage for which they must have access to an electric generating station. They are conveyed to the nearest one, and overpowering the assistants, take charge. The doctor is ordered to the switch which floods the whole town with the message that the electric generating station is held up by a gang of Chinese. The news is conveyed to the police, who rescue Rex Omar and Hartsdale at a critical moment, and arrest the Chinamen. Rex Omar discovers the secret of the drugged newspaper, and by injecting a very rare Eastern drug neutralizes the poison and the patients recover.

THE AVIATOR SPY (Three Parts).—The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir Edward May, having just completed an important treaty, leaves it with his secretary, Cyril Courtney, to safely deposit in the safe. He is just about to do so when the chief's daughter enters the office and requests him to escort her on one of her many missions of mercy to a poor cottage in the village. As they pass through the park gates they are accosted by Paul Koffman, a foreign spy, who has come over with instructions to obtain possession of the treaty at all costs or at least a copy of it.

Cyril Courtney and Miss May proceed to the cottage of a Mrs. Drake, an invalid, whose only son has on more than one occasion been warned for poaching. After their return Courtney takes the opportunity to propose to May, but is refused. Paul Koffman, with two confederates, consider the best method of securing the treaty or gain an entrance to the house in order to copy it, and a clever but dastardly plan is arranged.

By watching the house for many days they learn that the secretary's daughter daily goes on the river unaccompanied. Their plan is that while Koffman poses on the bank as an artist one of his confederates should purposely row into Miss May's punt, causing a supposed accident. Koffman, who is a very strong swimmer, takes the opportunity of rescuing the girl, whom he lands at the steps leading to the river of her own house, terribly unnerved by her experience. The grateful parent invites the rescuer to dinner, which fact Koffman communicates to his companions in crime and an immediate action is decided upon.

A meeting at night is arranged in a lonely part of the woods adjoining the house in an old disused shed and Koffman armed with a very strong drug and hand camera sets out to keep the appointment. Young Drake, whose poaching habits have taken him to the same spot, overhears their plans and carefully watches Koffman start for the house, but in his anxiety to learn more betrays his presence and receives a wound in the head which renders him unconscious. Knowing their conversation has been overheard by Drake, they drag him into the hut, bind him securely on an old table, set fire to the place, make good their escape, leaving their victim at the mercy of the raging fire. Koffman is entertained royally at dinner, where May listens to his many tales of aduventure with admiration; but the expression of Courtney's face betrays his inner feelings of mistrust and dislike to the visitor. She leaves the gentlemen to take coffee alone and Courtney under the excuse of feeling drowsy walks into the grounds.

In deep thought at the disappointment he had received by Miss May's refusal earlier in the day he wanders by the river and across the old bridge, in an aimless manner, when suddenly his attention is attracted by the smoke from the burning hut. With all speed he hastens to the fire, where on bursting the door he discovers Drake unconscious and within an ace of death. Severing the ropes he carries the victim into safety and only has time to hand him to the gamekeepers who have now arrived on the scene when he himself becomes overpowered by the smoke. He soon recovers and directs the wounded man should be lifted tenderly on an improvised stretcher and carried to the house, but their journey is intercepted by the butler who informs them that their master has been taken suddenly ill in a mysterious manner and that all attempts to rouse him from the sleep that he appears to be in has proved fruitless. Leaving the keepers to slowly make their way to the house, he hastens on to the library where he finds Miss May prostrated with grief over the body of her unconscious father, and the visitor vanished. The police are summoned and they learn from Drake, who has sufficiently recovered to tell his story, that the secretary's coffee has been drugged, his keys taken from his pocket, the treaty removed from the safe and been copied by flashlight photography.

During the conversation at dinner Koffman had given his experience while flying, also the address of the Aerodrome where his machine is kent, and the police acting on this clue decide to carefully watch the establishment. In the meantime Koffman and his men are busy developing the film which proves a great success when a telegram arrives informing them that the copy must be delivered within twenty-four hours or it will be useless, and they decide to use the aeroplane to carry out these instructions. Koffman manages to get away just as the police arrive, but his accomplices are captured. Courtney, who is himself an experienced pilot, charters the fastest machine possible, determined to give chase. He loses no time and soon locates his man. A terrible race between the two airships takes place and shots are exchanged in mid-air, which ends in Courtney hitting the petrol tank of Koffman's machine, but the latter again escapes by means of his parachute. Both land in the same field, but Koffman on being chased holds up a motor car which he enters and at the point of his revolver compels the driver to put on all speed. Courtney has been so far successful in bringing his man to earth, but is without means of following the fast disappearing car until he notices a horse grazing in a neighboring field; quickly mounting he gives chase, but each mile increases the distance between them, and the animal cannot stand the strain. Courtney is about to give up the chase when he sees a motorcycle stand outside a country inn. Dismounting the horse, he commandeers the cycle and is well after his man before anyone has realized what has taken place, and setting the engine at full speed, settles down to a more evenly contested chase. As the cycle nears the car shots are frequently exchanged, but without result, and it is evident that the cycle is quickly gaining ground. Koffman by threats compells the driver to put on more speed which, however, proves fatal, as on turning a sharp bend in the road the car mounts the bank and is overturned. Courtney sees what has occurred and slows up. Reaching the spot the sickening sight of two dead bodies meets his gaze. Farm hands render assistance to remove the debris while Courtney with the film, which is still wet, in his possession, returns to his anxious chief. Here he has to give a very full detailed account to Sir Edward and his daughter of his many adventures in order to get possession of the film, but the former's thanks are completely lost to Courtney when Miss May with outstretched hands murmurs, "Forgive me."

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode Eighteen—Reels Thirty-five and Thirty-six). The narrow escape of the conspirators after attempting to capture Norton, determine them to solve the secret of the vanished million. A news item in one of the daily papers catches the Countess Olga's eye and she hastens to apprise Braine. It is a notice of a masked ball Princess Parlova is to give. The Countess sees an opportunity for a grand coup. Braine tells her that the Princess was formerly a member of the Black Hundred, long since inactive, but must still be true to her oath if called upon. He gives Olga a mystical ring, identifying her as a member of the secret order. He compels the Princess to accede to any request she may make.

With this ring and a note from Braine, the Countess goes to the Princess Parlova and demands that the Princess write invitations to Norton and Florence and also give her four blank invitations for herself, Braine and two of the gang. The Princess, not daring to refuse, is compelled to grant her demands.

Norton and Florence receive their invitations. While wondering why they received them, the Countess Olga arrives and is promptly told of their good fortune. She suggests they go with her to a costumer's, as original costumes are not always easy to be had. The two accept the courtesies of her car and are soon set down before the shop. Norton chooses a court suit such as was used in the time of Louis XV., and Florence a flounced and ruffled dress of the same period; they return home. Meanwhile Braine, who has been notified they are at the costumer's, arrives and, when they have gone, enters the shop and obtains two suits exactly the same.

At the ball, Florence and Norton, and Braine and the Countess Olga, their respective disguises the duplicates of each other, present themselves to the Princess Parlova. The princess, seated in a sort of sedan chair, receives her guests and gives the signal for the dancing to begin. Later Norton and Florence are approached by two of the masked dancers, one of whom asks Florence for a dance. An instant later she is whirled away on his arm. When the dance is over, Braine, whose garb is identical with Norton's, approaches and asks her to follow him. "I have discovered something important," he mumbles. "Come where we can talk." Suspecting nothing, Florence follows him and she suddenly finds herself again in the power of the conspirators. Braine and the Countess Olga bid the Princess goodnight and calling Florence's car hurry to the Hargreave mansion. There, once the unsuspecting chauffeur has passed around to the back of the house, they retrace their steps to another auto waiting for them outside the grounds. Norton, convinced that something is wrong, hastens to the Hargreave house. After a hurried colloquy with the chauffeur, he and Jones set out for the Princess Parlova's home.

Meanwhile, Florence is in desperate straits. She has been bound tightly and threats have been made to force her to reveal the hiding place of the Hargreave fortune. One of the conspirators shows her a deadly clock-work bomb, which he sets going, and threatens to leave beneath the chair unless she reveals the precious secret. Florence pleads ignorance of its whereabouts.

As Norton and Jones arrive there is a tremendous explosion. The bomb has gone off. In an instant panic seizes the conspirators and the guests. Shrieks of alarm and the dust of the shattered walls fill the house. Norton plunges in search of Florence. He finds her, frees her, and drags her to a window. The flames are nearly upon them as Jones throws him a rope by which he lowers Florence to the ground. That done, he essays to descend himself, but the fire reaches and burns through the rope and he plunges heavily to the ground.

PARAMOUNT.

THE COUNTY CHAIRMAN (Five Parts—Famous Players).—Jim Hackler and Elias Rigby had been boyhood friends, and when together they enlisted in the Civil War, both loved the same girl, who, however, favored Jim. In the army Rigby intercepted the lover's mail, and after the war was ended made the girl his wife, and Jim has been his political enemy ever since. In order to defeat Rigby for prosecuting attorney, Hackler storms the convention of his party, and secures the nomination for Wheeler, without the latter's knowledge. Jim's youthful partner is engaged to Rigby's daughter Lucy, but despite that fact he is forced to make the race by the County Chairman. Wheeler, however, promises the girl he will not make a personal fight against her father, and lives up to that agreement until Rigby publicly assails him at a political meeting. In an outburst of anger Wheeler thereupon mounts the platform and vigorously denounces Rigby. As a result of this action the engagement is broken.

At this juncture Hackler discovers proof that Rigby is a thief, with which he is about to expose and disgrace his enemy when Rigby's wife, toward whom Jim still feels tenderly pleads with him not to publish the facts of her husband's guilt; and Jim's deathless love for the woman conquers his desire for revenge.

Hackler, however, is equal to all emergencies. He so manipulates political wires and so contrives the young man's romantic affairs that, as the smoke of battle clears away, the County Chairman and his political protege emerge triumphant, the former with a gratified vengeance, and the latter with his office and his bride.

The Light Which Does Not Interfere With Projection

The day of the dark theatre has passed. This is due primarily to the perfection of the EYE COMFORT LIGHTING System. This system is neither an imitation nor a substitute. It is based on fundamental principles discovered by us and proven by long practice to be absolutely correct. It is the original indirect lighting.

Indirect Light does not interfere with the clearness of the picture. It has no glare, does not distract attention or cause headaches.

It lights the house evenly. It relieves eyestrain.

The Eye Comfort Lighting System

is so good and so successful that it is imitated. But these imitations, which are offered you because they are "cheap," lack the powerful one-piece silvered mirror X-RAY EYE COMFORT reflectors which control and direct the light by their scientific design and evenly light the house. These are the most powerful reflectors made and require less current than any others.

Fill in the blank below and allow our engineers to lay out a plan for lighting your theatre. This won't cost you a cent and does not obligate you in any way. But it will tell you exactly how much EYE COMFORT LIGHTING for your theatre would cost.

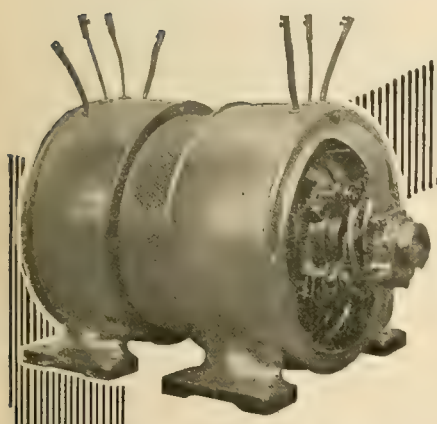
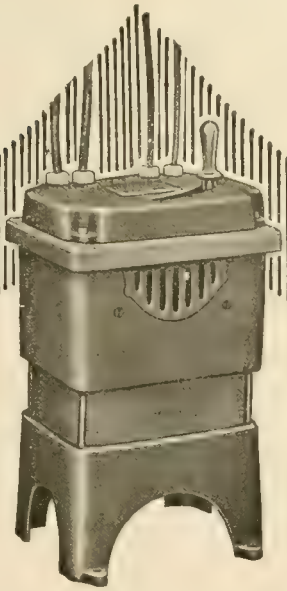
BETTER LIGHT

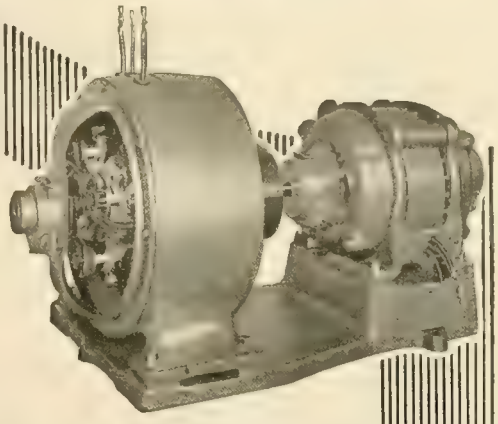
LESS CURRENT



The DC Compensarc lowers the voltage of a direct current supply to that required at the lamp without needless waste.



The AC Compensarc cuts ⅔ from your lighting bill if you use alternating current.



The AC to DC Compensarc will transform alternating into direct current and reduce the voltage at the same time without needless waste.

No matter what current you have---Alternating or Direct---or what voltage or frequency, one of the will enable you to secure a light that will give those clear, bright pictures that everybody now demands.

What's the use of paying extra money for special screens, projecting machines, and first run films and then spoil the whole result with poor light? With the Fort Wayne Compensarcs you can get any kind of light you want regardless of the kind or quality of your current supply.

The Compensarcs will give you

STEADY LIGHT. No flickering, no sputtering, even when changing intensities or from one machine to another.

WHITE LIGHT. No yellow streaks, no ghosts.

BRIGHT LIGHT. Three times the light with two-thirds the current.

They are safe, efficient, easy to operate, fool proof and reliable.

Compensarcs are so commonly found in motion picture theatres that many people now call all current saving and transforming devices by that name.

ABOUT

CARBONS

Unscrupulous speculators are still shouting "CARBON FAMINE" and trying to scare exhibitors into paying as high as fifteen dollars per hundred for 5/8 x 12 carbons—an increase of over four hundred per cent.

We have endeavored to protect you against this extortion by offering to divide our limited stock at the old prices among those shows which were in danger of closing, but our announcement probably did not reach every one.

We are beginning to get returns from our increased equipment and by the time this goes to press, we will be in a position to take care of all exhibitors who are short on carbons, if they do not come at us too strong.

We have made no advance in price, but we reserve the right to cut any order to five hundred or less in case our stock does not warrant filling larger orders.

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

Cincinnati!

There are 76 theatres in Cincinnati and vicinity and the Universal has won 30 of them! It's time for every thinking exhibitor to use the brains God gave him! This means you!

"Terence O'Rourke!"

Look for J. Warren Kerrigan in "Terence O'Rourke, Gentleman Adventurer," Every Other Week

—There was never such an adventurer as the Gentleman Adventurer and there was never a finer series of adventure stories than these with the popular Kerrigan (releasing every other week, from Monday, Nov. 9th on).

—The first adventure, entitled "His Heart, His Hand, His Sword," is a picture of the romantic night life of the Paris that was before the war. Louis Joseph Vance wrote the story. We know the statement will astound you, but the whole blessed series is in the regular program—as regular VICTOR two-reelers.

—Down at the bottom of this page you'll find other features and other stars in the "regular program" list that NO OTHER MANUFACTURER COULD AFFORD TO HAVE THERE.

—Now let us talk "Opened Shutters," the regular four-reel Gold Seal from the pen of Clara Louise Burnham. Otis Turner, the great director, made it, and had this grand company: Herbert Rawlinson, Anna Little, Betty Schade, William Worthington, Cora Drew and Frank Lloyd. A marvelous story based on the power of thought. Posters? Two 6-sheets, two 3-sheets, three 1-sheets! And the 6-sheets make up into a smashing 12-sheet!!

MARY FULLER, ANNA LITTLE, VIOLET MERSEREAU, CLEO MADISON and MARIE WALCAMP

Are some of the famous Universal Stars that you get in that Universal Feature Program for the week of November 9th. Here is the Program: Monday, November 9th, Victor's "Terence O'Rourke, Gentleman Adventurer," J. Warren Kerrigan; No. 1, "His Heart, His Sword, His Hand." Tuesday, November 10th, "Trey O' Hearts," Cleo Madison and George Larkin, Episode 15, "The Last Trump." The Thanhouser Three-a-Week

Following are the Thanhouser releases for the current week. These releases are distributed exclusively in the United States and Canada by the Mutual Film Corporation.

Tuesday, November 3rd, "The Turning of the Road" (two reels). This is a powerful drama of society life. It portrays the actions of a band of thieves who work among the best society. A member of the band—Della Fletcher — is the character around which the plot revolves. Her stealing of the gems and her ultimate reformation and marriage to a handsome rector form a basis for many tense scenes. She is led by love out of the shadows into the light and the turning of a new road. The cast includes Muriel Ostriche, Frank Woods, John Reinhard, Ethyle Cook, Ernest Ward, Carey Hastings, Arthur Bauer, Perry Horton.

Sunday, November 8th, "Keeping a Husband" (one reel). A decidedly clever drama of home life, showing how a wife's strategy makes it possible for her to retain her husband's love in spite of severe temptations. This photoplay is very capably enacted by Muriel Ostriche, Carey L. Hastings and Ernest C. Ward.

JULIUS CAESAR!

20,000 people were employed in many of the big scenes in "Caesar." If you think that an over-estimate remember this statement when you see "CAESAR." It will recall the ninth-inning break-up of a World-Championship Ball Game or a glimpse of Broadway New Year's Eve!

Filmdom's Greatest Spectacle

"Julius Caesar" has no rival. As the man himself stands alone among the famous immortals of history, so does this film record of his life stand alone among famous pictures. In point of ensemble and stirring spectacle even "Quo Vadis?" and "Antony and Cleopatra" shrink by comparison. Any one of twenty scenes in "Caesar" will equal three of "Quo Vadis?"

Over $100,000 Spent for Properties!

Consider that. The enormous expense of costuming 20,000 people, the building of scenery, chariots, statues, musical instruments, war implements from the Roman broad sword and catapult to the Gallic shield and helmet! Ten thousand and one articles gathered from museums, rented or made!

Featuring Anthony Novelli

in the title role of "CAESAR." Anthony Novelli, who endeared himself to thousands of American picture fans in "Quo Vadis?" and "Antony and Cleopatra," does his greatest work in "Caesar." Both physically and temperamentally fitted for the part, Novelli makes a striking, forceful, virile picture of the great Dictator.

The Story

follows "Caesar" through his courtship and marriage with pretty Cornelia, his banishment from Rome; his return and election to the consulship; his campaign in Gaul; his famous quarrel with Pompey and the resulting bloody field of Pharsalus; the conspiracy of Cato and Brutus and his assassination at the foot of Pompey's statue.

"Julius Caesar" Will Pack Them In

The magnetic title and the remarkably attractive, seven-color lithographs furnished with this feature will bring them in. And you will delight them with the biggest, greatest motion picture spectacle they have ever seen. "Julius Caesar" leaves an indelible impression on the mind of all who see it.

A QUESTION OF IDENTITY

A Dramatic Adaptation of "The Window that Monsieur Forgot."

By CHARLES IMLAY TAYLOR

Here is a film of thrilling dramatic interest. Twin brothers so much resemble each other that in the culmination of the criminal career of one the question of identity was exceedingly difficult to decide. One had murdered the Chevalier but had escaped immediate arrest. The other brother was charged with the crime. Which was which? The final scene in the Police Court where sentence was about to be passed upon the innocent brother is halted by the arrival of the dead brother's body, for he had resisted arrest after being hunted down by witnesses to the affair. A thrilling film throughout. The air of reality will cause this film to be widely commented upon.

Facts and Comments

QUITE a novel use for motion pictures has been found in connection with regular stage productions. The intervals between acts is filled up with motion pictures bridging over the time between the action of the first and the second act, and so on. This makes the whole play seem more continuous and coherent and at the same time does away with the tedium of waiting between the acts. We can see a new field for motion picture work growing up in this direction. Well done such work ought to be of the utmost value to the speaking stage and it certainly will be welcome to the audiences. The first experiment which was tried in New York seems to have been a decided success.

LIKE every great industry which has made a rapid advance the motion picture has attracted and is attracting capital from inexperienced quarters. While in Europe, and especially in England, this new capital seeks investment in the erection of new motion picture theaters the American investor seems to be drawn toward the producing end of the industry. Great amounts of money are constantly being invested in this most difficult and somewhat precarious branch of the industry, and it happens so often that only the most superficial investigation or no investigation at all precedes such investments. The market, as a consequence, is crowded with a lot of mediocre and often inferior stuff which promoters will tell us "can be easily disposed of because it is just as good as some of the stuff that is being shown at the moving picture theaters." These enthusiasts forget that not a little of the cheap stuff is distributed through a perfect commercial organization, and in the course of a regular service which the exhibitor finds it difficult to do without. The prospects of the new producer, who has nothing to offer but ordinary productions, are decidedly poor. High quality in feature subjects and good comedy are the only things which are in brisk demand and of which we can never get enough.

SLIPSHOD titles and foolish titles will appear on the screen probably to the end of the chapter, but there are some abuses that ought to disappear because it is easy to remedy them and because they mar the spectators' pleasure. The word "Later" is one of the chief offenders. It is, as a rule, a confession of laziness or incompetency on the part of the title builder. Under no conceivable circumstances can the word "Later" as a subtitle help to explain things. The spectator knows that scene five is later than scene four. If the picture is not plain and logical enough to convey the idea of sequence the title "Later" is, to say the least, superfluous and unprofitable. Let us expurgate the word from the title-builders' dictionary.

A FRIENDLY reader of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD writes of a photoplay which he says serves as a cloak for advertising a certain brand of tobacco. He objects to some of the scenes and subtitles, which show and tell about how easy it is to roll a cigarette, etc., etc. We have never heard of such a photoplay and we feel pretty confident that few exhibitors will care to throw it on their screens. We rather think that the divorce of the screen from such abuses has been absolute and will stay that way. Advertising schemes of that character are easily detected and stopped.

EFFORTS to popularize the motion picture generally by filming local events and persons of local prominence have everywhere proven successful. We cannot think of any better means of dissipating prejudice and driving away ignorance. A friend and reader sends us interesting accounts of this practical and wise use of the motion picture camera in several prominent cities in the South. State fairs and governors are being put on the film and make interesting spectacles for local patriotism. It is quite likely, too, that such films will win political favor and enlist the sympathy and friendly interest of legislators. Such films afford great advertising possibilities for the exhibitor, as an appeal to local pride and enthusiasm is seldom made without good results.

NOTHING is more repugnant to good taste than a poor imitation. We are moved to hang up this bromide for inspection because of the attempts of various managers to inject, or rather to hammer, classic music into the motion picture entertainments, just because it has proven a success in one notable instance. Wisdom in selection and in determining the size of the musical dose is necessary; attempts at pitchforking are painful. The old Latin proverb is as true as ever: "When two men do the same thing it is not the same thing." Imitation may be a sincere compliment to the originator, but it is mostly unmitigated pain to the audience.

Problem Plays

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

THERE is no blanket classifications for the big picture of five or ten reels to distinguish it from the thousand-foot release, otherwise it would be possible to discriminate among these visualized novels and set apart stories which deal with right and wrong in human conduct. The term "problem play" has in consequence become something of a blanket in itself, and a pretty warm one at times. To get at its true significance we might as well eliminate plays of fantasy, comedy and pure sentimentality as a preliminary, and then take a look at ourselves. We have been continually solving problems, or trying to, during our recent progress, but our advance, far from disposing of these problems, changes our viewpoint and we face new complications. From a habit of discussing faulty political and unsatisfactory social conditions, we have acquired the problem-solving habit.

British dramatists, and some continental ones, were quick to perceive the trend of enlightened thought and the most successful of them are now writing with a moral view, as critics of life, and some of them are convinced that all kinds of theaters will eventually turn to popularizing social, philosophical and religious ideas. There is little doubt that the theaters, big and little, exercise an influence on the formation of character, but to what extent they should be used for purposes of instruction, I leave to those gentlemen who delight in the controversial. We will try to get down to the actual. In doing this we must admit that "advancement" implies a change of ground, being slightly removed from the term "standing still."

If we had reached a perpetual standstill, we could easily turn back and review the past with its truth and its error, and we might formulate a precise set of rules as to our conduct for all time. The trouble is that there are restless individuals in our midst who persist in moving along to greater heights, occasionally glancing back, but marching on with such overwhelming force of example that the others, more or less reluctantly, follow along. It will not do, however, for the pioneers to set a pace too swift. Though they may chafe under restraint, if that restraint is exercised by those who are chiefly occupied with making money that they may eat and sleep in safety, and have a respectable number of mourners at the funeral. God, in His infinite wisdom, has given man a source of exhaustless joy in egotism. Each one who satisfies his appetite, know how to button and unbutton and can sleep in a rent-paid box can say, "Look at me—I have lived," proud, though bewildered, that he did it.

These favorites of fortune, to whom is given sustenance, raiment, shelter and a hair mattress, feel that it would be perilous to get away from what is into what-is-possible-yet-might-not-be, hence they move with infinite caution—they are conservative. An oyster is an ultra-conservative. He eats and sleeps where he is and says, "I should worry." Men of great mental vigor are not oysters. They are constantly on the move, and they often exhaust themselves from lack of judgment and self-control, but the most enlightened portions of the human race are progressive, and to that portion nearly all written or pictured criticisms of life are addressed. There is a certain intensity about such minds that projects them forward into discovery, into mechanical invention and into drama that deals with problems still unsolved, hence the problem play.

It is possibly taken for granted that I am now to advocate problem plays, but such is not my purpose, rather to define them and refer to their treatment, for I have certain oyster-like inclinations to contend with at this particular stage of motion-picture production. Better than anything else on the screen, I enjoy a good story that is well told, whether or not it solves a problem, or even offers a problem to be solved. Nor do I object to the problem if the story is a strong one, but I prefer to have it submerged, entirely subordinated to enthralling interest in human character as exhibited in dramatic situations. My personal preference, first for the story, does not, however, blind me. I realize that the ideals of Shaw, Pinero, Klein, Galsworthy, Thomas, and a long string of dramatists who have created plays as of high merit, dealing with modern problems, can easily be on the right track. I cannot, in fact, recall at this moment a single playwright of unqualified success who has not attempted or written problem plays, all more or less influenced by Ibsen.

Ibsen's habit was to start with an idea. Among his notes were found epigrams pointing directly to the plays bracketed after them. For instance, "Freedom consists in securing for the individual the right to free himself—everyone according to his needs" (The Lady from the Sea). On the background of a well-defined idea he built a scenario and from that his big story. He then set his characters in motion, studied their individuality and allowed them to concentrate at the crises by very natural means. It may be thought that his pre-eminence is due to his presentation of sociological problems, but it may just as well be due to his power to delve deep into character, and his intensely human representations. Above all things he told a story. The problem, the characterization, the situation, these were contributary, but it has always seemed to me that stories, themselves, counted most, the fine adjustment of all elements.

For a playwright to start with a problem he has studied in a superficial way seems like building a house on an insecure foundation. The problem play becomes an exponent of error unless founded on a sure knowledge of the truth, the truth as recognized, the truth that carries conviction, and this is one reason I do not advocate it at this stage of motion-picture development, especially if the author attempts to settle his problem. Let the audience do that, and I see no reason why social, political and religious problems should not furnish rich fields for themes. It is difficult, however, to state where else the authors of large screen portrayals are to go for material. There is a problem in nearly every big story of human life, a problem in nearly every phase of life yet awaiting solution, so it would seem that they must play a part in drama that is to be salient and vital.

After all, there is a great deal in the man who makes the drama. That individualities differ must result in variety of authorship, variety of direction, variety of acting. There are photoplaywrights of marked power and decided originality just now entering the field, and they will do some great things when the whole art of production is in good working order. According to Granville Barker, "We must go on breaking new ground, enlarging the boundaries of the new drama, fitting it for every sort of expression. When we deserve it, a new dramatic genius will arise. He will neither break laws nor obey them. He will make laws and there will happily be no questioning." From the new playwrights we look for stories of large human concern which possess the indispensable quality of interesting an intelligent audience.

Exhibitors, Assert Your Rights

By W. Stephen Bush.

THIS seems to be an auspicious moment for the exhibitors in the state of New York to assert and enforce a legal right guaranteed to them by the clear decisions of the courts. I am speaking of the right to show motion pictures on Sunday. It is true that in some parts of the state this right is freely exercised by exhibitors. In the five boroughs comprising the city of New York and in some parts of northern and western New York motion pictures are shown on Sunday without any let or hindrance. There remains, however, a considerable portion of the state in which for some reason or other the exhibitors have hesitated to claim their rights under the law.

I consider this moment auspicious, firstly, because there is no time like the present, and, secondly, because public opinion today regards the motion picture with far greater approval than six years ago, when the first decision in favor of Sunday exhibition was rendered by the courts. We may well resume the agitation for the Sunday entertainment at this time because the experience of the last six years has shown that no harm whatever has resulted from the exhibition of motion pictures on Sunday. On the contrary, we may go one step further and advance the claim that the motion picture entertainment on Sunday has been of some educational value, at least, and has drawn the people away from amusements of much less innocent character. If the great mass of the people have for the last six years visited motion picture houses on Sunday with benefit to themselves and their families, a good reason, it seems to me, has been shown for continuing the practice and for extending it to every part of the state.

In order that the campaign for good and clean pictures on Sunday may be conducted intelligently and with the proper ammunition, I propose to outline somewhat briefly but thoroughly the legal foundation for the exhibitors' right to show motion pictures on Sunday in the state of New York. Nor will this outline be without value to the intelligent agitation for Sunday pictures in other states. The logic and reasoning of the judges as set forth in the recorded opinions in the court reports are invariably considered by the courts and judges of other states as well, and are, indeed, often as controlling in a neighboring state as they are in the original jurisdiction.

There are two distinct lines of defense for the exhibitor whose right to show pictures on Sunday may be questioned by the authorities. Both lines of defense are very strong, and wherever they have been used intelligently they have been found impregnable on the side of the exhibitor. Indeed, very recently the organized exhibitors of Binghamton appealed to the courts to vindicate their right of Sunday opening. A justice of the supreme court immediately granted an injunction restraining the city authorities of Binghamton from interfering with the Sunday exhibition of motion pictures. This happened but a few weeks ago and the same appeal to the courts is open to every exhibitor within the state.

The first decision in favor of Sunday motion pictures was rendered by the late Justice William A. Gaynor, in February, 1908, writing the prevailing opinion of the Appellate Division of the Second Department of the State. In that case, known as the People against Hemleb, the issue was squarely raised whether or not the motion picture entertainment came under the inhibition of Section 265, Penal Code, which forbids "shooting, fishing, sporting, playing, horse racing or other public sports, exercises and shows on Sunday." Justice Gaynor decided that the motion picture exhibition did not come under the specified acts prohibited on Sunday. His decision was the decision of the Appellate Division and is now the law of the state. In the course of his decision Judge Gaynor remarks that no known church or sect except in the British Isles, and not there until recent centuries, ever entertained the Old Testament notion of a still Sabbath, but favored and practised innocent and healthy exercises and amusements after church on Sunday."

This decision of the Appellate Division was followed a short time after it was rendered by Justice Blackmar at the special term of the Kings County Supreme Court. Justice Blackmar follows the language of the original decision and declares, until it is reversed, Judge Gaynor's decision is absolutely controlling in this state. Before Judge Blackmar the question was raised whether the charge of an admission might not alter the situation. Justice Blackmar distinctly says in his decision that the charge of an admission is not material on the issues presented by the question of whether the motion picture entertainment is one of the specified acts which the legislature has forbidden to take place on Sunday. The decision of Judge Blackmar was rendered in connection with the attempt of Mayor McClellan to wipe moving pictures out of existence. It goes into the question of Sunday opening at some length and follows the reasoning of Judge Gaynor's decision. The justice in the court at Binghamton in his brief decision rendered a few weeks ago reiterates the language of Justice Blackmar and declares unequivocally that the courts in their interpretation of the Sunday law as to moving pictures are bound and controlled by the Gaynor decision. It would seem then that this first line of defense is impregnable. Under these decisions with the employment of a competent attorney the Sunday opening ought to be a matter of course, especially now, when, as pointed out before, public opinion has become enthusiastic in its support of the motion picture entertainment.

We have, however, a second line of defense, even if Judge Gaynor's decision should be reversed by a higher court, that is to say, by the Court of Appeals. This second line of defense rests upon a decision by Judge Carr of the Supreme Court of Kings County, who in the case of the People against Finn laid down a rule which is too little known and too little appreciated by the exhibitors of this state. It appears to me of immense value for the Sunday agitation, not only in the state of New York, but everywhere, because its reasoning is preeminently clear and sound. In this decision, rendered at Special Term, a short time before Judge Gaynor's decision, Justice Carr decided that a motion picture entertainment at which pictures were used in illustration of a lecture did not constitute a violation of the Sunday law. He discharged the prisoner, who had been arrested, from custody, writing a very strong opinion in support of the legality of a motion picture entertainment in which the lecture played a prominent part. It appears that in the case decided by him the entertainment consisted of some biblical pictures and a picture showing the lumber industry of California. A brief explanatory lecture was given with each subject. Justice Carr in his opinion says that such an exhibition on Sunday was entirely legal and could not be stopped. It was urged by the prosecution in this case that a song was rendered in connection with the entertainment and that, as both the lecturer and the singer were standing upon the stage while contributing to the entertainment, the latter must be characterized as a stage entertainment, which was one of the specified acts prohibited on Sunday by legislative enactment. Justice Carr riddles this contention with some show of sarcasm. There is, however, one sentence in his decision which I particularly recommend to the careful consideration of exhibitors everywhere. Here it is: "The showing of motion pictures may or may not constitute a violation of the law. It all depends upon the methods or purposes of the show."

I have pointed out repeatedly in these columns that no man in his senses would ever think of stopping the exhibition of stereopticon slides on Sunday when used in connection with a lecture. It seems perfectly clear that the picture in motion when used in connection with a lecture is no more of a Sabbath breaker than the still picture would be.

It now remains with the exhibitors whether they wish to give Sunday exhibitions or not. It may be that in some communities in this and other states the exhibitor is more afraid of public opinion than of the law. I cannot conceive how a properly selected Sunday program which, both in its contents and in its presentation, pays some regard to the character of the day can be offensive to any person who is not a fanatic and whose opinion is worth having. Motion picture exhibitions on Sunday are quite frequent in the churches.

They Want Our Pictures

Theatre Managers of Central America "Hot Foot" for American Subjects.

EXHIBITORS in the countries down by Panama are hot foot after American films," says Will H. White, who has returned from a long trip through Central America, "and today they are even more anxious to get our pictures on account of the war in Europe." Mr. White says that the showmen down south have been using French and Italian films, but that if American producers would put Spanish sub-titles on their product it would be well received in the south.

Teatro Moderno, San Jose, Costa Rica.

"Cowboy, Indian, and western pictures make quite an impression on the natives, and they never can get enough of these pictures. The cowboy films especially impress the people, for their country is full of good horses, and they naturally like to see pictures with horses in them."

He tells of the music in the theaters, which is one of the features of the show business. Each theater has a full orchestra of its own. Absolutely no rag time is played there, and only the classic tunes are heard by the people who love music so well. These people even have in their cities, municipal bands, which play every day. The musicians are instructed by the best teachers from Europe.

Mr. White states that "One peculiarity of the Central American exhibitor is that he splits the story. If he is showing a two or three-reel picture, he ends his first show in the middle of the story, and charges another admission to see the balance of the picture." CLARK IRVINE.

SAN FRANCISCO'S TRADE BOARD INCORPORATED.

The Film Exchange Board of Trade of San Francisco has been incorporated and the organization is now holding regular weekly meetings. Officers have been chosen as follows: President, Morris J. Markowitz, manager of the California Film Exchange; vice-president, J. R. Crone, manager of the San Francisco and Los Angeles offices of the Pacific Mutual Film Corporation; secretary-treasurer, O. V. Traggardh, manager of the Union Film and Supply Company. The Board of Directors consists of these officers, with Sol Lesser, of the Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc., and Tom North, manager of the San Francisco office of George Kleine attractions. Plans are being made to establish offices in the National Bank Building. A remarkable feature of the meetings that have been held to date has been the attendance. There are twenty-one active exchanges in San Francisco, and at no meeting have less than twenty been represented. Plans are now being considered for the formation of a similar body of exchange men at Los Angeles.

Besley Expedition Successful

Captain Returns from Second Visit to Land of Incas With Thousands of Feet of Film.

SEATED at a table in the tearoom of the Waldorf on Tuesday afternoon was a tall, spare man. His age, in spite of the white hair brushed straight back, seemed in the middle forties. Clear, blue eyes looked straight at you out of a face bronzed and lined by contact with the elements. It is a hearty handshake Captain J. Campbell Besley gives you, the kind that makes you feel acquainted in short order. The World man had called on the captain to ask him about his second trip to South America and suggested that he would wait elsewhere the finish of the repast just then placed on the table. "Better still," returned the captain. "Go right up to my apartment. You will find some photographs there that may interest you, as well as cigars and cigarettes."

Sure enough, there were still prints aplenty spread over the table. Many of them were exposed in the Land of the Incas. There were views of men struggling through mountain snows and lowland jungle. About the room were souvenirs of the trans-Andean trip. Captain Besley, it may be recalled, returned last February from a west to east trans-continental journey across South America. He had with his party after exploring the country about Lake Titicaca, traveled on horseback, on foot and by canoe and raft from the headwaters of the Amazon in Peru down to civilization. Hundreds of miles were through country unknown to white men. When the captain arrived in New York last winter he was unable to find any trace of the motion picture films he had exposed in the Land of the Incas and which, prior to his departure on the Amazon trip, he had shipped to New York. There was nothing to it. The pictures he had to have, and there was only one way to get them—and that was to return to South America. Arranging with J. K. Holbrook, of New York, the cameraman who accompanied him on his first trip, to meet him in Buenos Aires, the captain sailed from England last April.

Capt. J. C. Besley.

"Well, Captain," said the World man as the explorer entered his apartment, "did you bring back all your pictures this time?"

"Inded I did," he said. "They had me a bit uneasy, though, coming up the Ambrose Channel on the Metapan when the big Iowan, with 9,000 tons of freight on board, rammed our boat, compelling us to beach to avoid going under water. I brought back sixteen or eighteen thousand feet of film, a lot of it unusual stuff, and I didn't care to have it lost. Not this time, thank you." The Captain was out on deck, just under the bridge, when the collision occurred and has a clear recollection of the many and crowding events.

"About our trip? Why, from Buenos Aires we went up the Parana River to the Iqu Zu Falls. Then through Paraguay and Uruguay we returned to Buenos Aires and took the train to Mendoza, and then with a special snowplough to Punta del Inca, where we remained two or three days. Then with ten Indians we started out through the snow on a trip of adventure. We were anxious to learn conditions as they were in regions the railroad could not penetrate. We were then at 11,000 feet elevation. You know the snow line in the southern part of Chile in July is about 5,000 feet, whereas in Ecuador, up by the equator, it is thirteen or fourteen thousand feet. Every one tried to discourage us, on account of the land slides, but it was fortunate for William Carr, a fellow-countryman of yours, by the way, that we persisted. It was during our seven days' fight with the wind and snow in crossing the divide that we found Carr, unconscious and all but gone, buried in a snowdrift. He had been overcome in the fierce blizzard. I got hold of his tongue, pulled it out, poured brandy down his throat, chafed his hands and feet, and gradually he opened his eyes. He was mighty glad to hear the English language, although almost any would have sounded good. We carried him into Las Cuevas, six miles away. He recovered.

"We went on down the side until we struck Juncal. Here we had a novel slide for 1,500 feet sitting on a stick a la Mother Goose. We got a lift on a handcar that had been sent up to us. You understand the railroad can be used here only six months in the year. We did encounter one landslide on our cross-mountain journey, resulting in the death of one of our dogs. From Los Andes we went to Valparaiso and Santiago, Chile. Then we went to Lake Titicaca. We took a trip to the Island of the Moon, one of the most historical spots in South America. This is a wonderful country, this Titicaca, somewhere about 12,000 feet elevation. The magnificent body of water, containing thousands of square miles, is studded with islands."

In the Land of the Incas Captain Besley took many interesting pictures and unearthed some real treasures. He showed two pre-Inca vases, the ages of which have as yet not been estimated. Several human skulls as well as two mummies, supposed to be forty or fifty centuries old, were brought back by the captain.

It is expected that within a few days the films will be cut down and ready for presentation in one of the New York theaters. "We have got some good stuff," said Captain Besley, "and we think some thrilling bits, too, as well as a mass of most informing and educational matters. We have got pictures of wild beasts and snakes, but try your best you can't get your narrowest escapes on the film. If you knew when danger lurked, if your sun was shining and no trees intervened, and all the thousand and one essentials were in harmony it might be easier to put over the real big stuff. But come over anyway and see what we have to show you. I believe it is the best that has as yet been accomplished in the exploring and adventure line—yes, and educational, too."

Capt. Besley Calling a Halt.

Captain Besley is anxious to get back to his native England. He has plans that will take him as a member of a scouting organization to France or wherever his countrymen may be battling. The Captain has followed his exploring bent previously in Alaska and North and South Africa. There are two places on the map about which he is still curious—Thibet and the desert in Northwestern Australia. "These are hopes," said the Captain, "but of course it all depends on whether or not we are here at the end of the war."

"Your Girl and Mine"

A Powerful Photomelodrama in Eight Reels, by Selig, Specially Produced for Mrs. Medill McCormick and the National American Woman Suffrage Association.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THE near future, I firmly believe, will reveal to those who advocate equal suffrage that moving pictures, as shown in "Your Girl and Mine," will accomplish more for the cause than all that eloquent tongues have done since the movement was started. Mrs. Medill McCormick, chairwoman of the congressional committee of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, whose brain and efforts have made this great feature suffrage subject possible, has said of its purpose: "Realizing that the suffragists, like all other propaganda organizations, spend most of their time in talking to themselves in public, I felt it was necessary to try and originate a means of really reaching the public. There is no opposition to woman's suffrage in this country, because there is no argument of moment against it. The difficulty lies in not being able to reach the actual voters and to have them understand the reasons why women are working to be enfranchised. With this purpose in view I consulted with one of the greatest moving picture men in the country, and together we have worked out and produced one of the largest photoplays yet presented to the public. It is fittingly called 'Your Girl and Mine.' We have put together in this photoplay several of the most startling reasons why we wish to vote, and by weaving a romance around the illustrations we find that we are presenting to the public an interesting and exciting melodrama. In short, this is the 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' of the suffrage movement.

Olive Wyndham.

"Taking Harriet Beecher Stowe's famous work as guide, the author of 'Your Girl and Mine' has been careful to avoid anything that might look like 'just preaching.' The aim, first of all, was to produce a photoplay that would appeal to every man and woman, regardless of whether they knew anything about the suffrage movement or cared anything about it."

It is only necessary to mention the author's name to convince the reader of the powerful appeal made by this pictured story—Gilson Willetts, author of the scenario of "The Adventures of Kathlyn" and of many other notable photoplay subjects. The story and the arguments—the latter being pithily shown in the subtitles—are the work of his individual brain. There has been no collaboration.

In viewing the pictures the spectator is worked up to a high pitch of indignation over the wrongs of Rosalind Fairlie, a wealthy heiress, who has married a spendthrift and a man of loose morals. Just after the honeymoon, we see a creditor, who will not be denied, forcing his way into the Fairlie home and demanding immediate payment of his claim. Ben Austin, the shameless husband of a week or two, induces his young wife to sign a check for the amount by the gentle reminder, "Sorry, my dear, but you must pay my bills or they will seize your property," this being the law of that particular state. During the two years that follow Austin has almost beggared his wife by his demands, and she refuses to meet them. Then he seizes money collected by an agent from tenants and dismisses his wife's protest with the remark, "Under the law your money is also mine." Aunt Jane, Rosalind's sturdy relative, gives him a bit of her mind and he orders her from the Fairlie home on the grounds that "The law is on my side; I am absolute master here and she must leave this house."

On another occasion, when Austin and his boon companions, all intoxicated, make such an uproar in the family dining room, long after midnight, that they awake and terrify Rosalind and her two little daughters, Austin says, after his maudlin companions have been ejected by the butler at the command of his mistress, "The law makes me the ruler of this house. You cannot put me out." Rosalind then takes her children to the home of Aunt Jane; but the law orders them "returned to the roof of their father," and her mother love compels her to accompany them.

The climax of the injustice of existing laws in many states is reached when Ben Austin—before he dies from a wound inflicted by a woman whom he has betrayed before his marriage, and since then most grieviously wronged—makes a will bequeathing a fortune (just left him by an uncle) and the guardianship of his children to his unprincipled father. The distracted mother flees with her children to a watering resort, but a court order gives the children into the custody of their legal guardian. Before this order has been put into effect, Rosalind attempts to take the children out of the state; but is arrested on the state line, on the charge of abduction. Bonds are given by Aunt Jane for the appearance of her niece, and a woman lawyer, Eleanor Holbrook, takes charge of the defense.

During this trial the subtitles are veritable bombs, every one of them hitting the bull's eye. Here are a few of them taken from the plea made before jury and judge by Eleanor Holbrook: "My client is charged with the crime of abduction, and the prosecution asks you to send her to the penitentiary because she has attempted to get back the children whom she bore and whom her husband willed away without her consent." "Would you bow in respect to any law giving a wife the legal right to deed away her children, irrespective of her husband's wishes, to be lost to him forever?" "If women had a voice in framing the laws, would there be any law in any statute book in this broad land permitting a father to deed or will away, in spite of the mother's anguish, the children which she bore him?" "If this mother's act was a crime, then all the mothers are potential criminals."

There is a positive, great relief in the mind of the spectator of these scenes when the jury returns a verdict of "Not Guilty," and the judge finds the elder Austin unfit to be the guardian of his grandchildren.

The subsidiary stories of Kate Price, the "other woman," and staunch, kind-hearted Aunt Jane, the good angel of the helpless and downtrodden, contribute great strength to the main narrative and to the righteousness of the struggle for equal suffrage.

The acting, with one minor exception, is very praiseworthy. Miss Katherine Henry, in the part of Kate Price, the "other woman," stands out most prominently. She positively grips our compassion by the natural force of her appeal. Aunt Jane, the ardent suffragist, is delightfully pleasing as presented by Miss Clara Smith. Miss Olive Wyndham happily portrays the aristocratic Rosalind, who sways like a fragile reed in life's storm without the support of good Aunt Jane. The new vigor and courage imparted by a sense of her wrongs and by her enlistment with the suffragist forces, to prevent a repetition in her own or any other's case, are revealed artistically by Miss Wyndham. No better selection could have been made for the part of Eleanor Holbrook, the woman lawyer, than Miss Katherine Kaelred. Her physique, costume and make-up fit the part like a dot, and her manner of saying and doing things in the courtroom scene is superb. She will be the cause of hundreds of thousands of smiles and laughs during the present suffrage campaign. John Charles impersonates Ben Austin, the gentleman villain, with the art of an accomplished actor, and Sydney Booth will be welcomed everywhere as the counterpart of Richard Burbank, Lieut. Governor. Dr. Anna Howard Shaw is seen in the pictures, addressing a meeting. In the allegorical characters of Equal Suffrage and Justice Misses Grace Darmond and Margaret Collier are impressive and effective.

The production was made under the direction of Giles Warren, who can be congratulated on the fine success of his work. It would be well to precede the death of Kate Price in the prison hospital by a subtitle. As it is now, the spectator is likely to miss the meaning of that scene, as I did the first time. The use of allegory, both in the title and action, in the Garden of Infamy scene, is incompatible with the actual scene in which Kate Price is arrested on the charge of robbery. There is no need for the former, as the Price incident is sufficient to convey the moral. The photography is of a high standard and the production includes many fine interiors and exteriors.

To many readers it will be news that Mrs. Medill McCormick is a daughter of the late Senator Mark Hanna, who figured so prominently in national politics during the McKinley regime.

"TICKET OF LEAVE MAN" NOT A WHARTON PICTURE.

"The Ordeal"

Featuring Anna Laughlin.

Reviewed by the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

THIS picture might easily be styled "a dream that was not all a dream." The story itself is simply the dream of a young man who declines to enlist in the army because of his sweetheart and who has been taken to task by his father, who himself had been in his younger days a gallant soldier. As it is told, however, the narrative is distinctly partisan and an allusion to the present war in Europe. So much so, in fact, that it will probably be barred from exhibition by the authorities all over the country. The contending armies are unmistakably French and German, even to the flags used and every effort has been employed to show off the Germans in a bad light and to glorify the French. The reference to the present political conditions is still further emphasized by a tag picture at the end showing President Wilson haranguing a conference of the present rulers of Europe on the duties and advantages of peace.

According to the story, which is said to be the illustration of a poem some of the very limpy verses of which are given in leaders, a French youth, at the pleadings of his sweetheart, refuses to enlist when the recruiting officers come to his village although all the other young men in the village do. When his father learns of it, he reproves his son and tells him of what he had done in his own youth as a soldier. The boy drops off to sleep that night thinking about what his father has said and dreams. He enlists, with a party of his comrades is cut off from the rest of the army in a battle, is himself wounded and seeks refuge in his own home. The Germans occupy the village and a rival for the hand of the boy's sweetheart betrays the boy into their hands. The rest of the story is taken up with portraying the brutal third degree administered to the boy by the German general because the young fellow will not tell where his comrades are hid, beginning with the uncalled for murder of his father and winding up with the shooting before his eyes of his mother and sister and sweetheart, and his own death.

The acting is mediocre and amateurish and there is a palpable effort to gain meretricious effects by trick work, tinting, etc.

MINNEAPOLIS TRIES CHILDREN'S SHOWS.

The Prescott School in Minneapolis, Minn., has gone into the moving picture business. The teachers have leased the New Arion Theater and will give two shows every Wednesday afternoon, one at 3.30 and one at 4.30. The first show will be free. Thereafter an admission of five cents will be charged. The first program included "Red Riding Hood," "Wild Beasts at Large" and a "Broncho Billy." As evidenced by this selection no effort will be made to limit the subjects to ultra-educational films. The aim will be to appeal to the natural instincts of the children. The opinions of the young patrons will be sought as an aid in making up satisfactory bills. The teachers have written letters to parents of the pupils, the business men, ministers and club members of the district, asking their co-operation.

"What Could She Do?"

A Three-Part Edison Drama by Gertrude Lyon Depicting the Struggle of a Southern Girl Against Unfavorable Environment.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

JOHN H. COLLINS has very attractively shown what may happen to a bright Southern girl when thrown on her own resources. What the story proves may be determined by the fact that the heroine, after an education suited only to a "lady," is remarkably capable where one would think business training and general experience might be most effective. This corresponds to Wilde's statement, "Education is an admirable theory, but it is well to remember from time to time that nothing really worth knowing can be taught."

The southern rose is simply a sweet flower when death and disaster come hand in hand to Colonel Fairfax. The girl is thrust out on the world. "What could she do?" She is not without friends, but she discards their pitying overtures and strikes out on her own account. In that is the keynote of her character: independence, a spirit not to be crushed by force of circumstances however overwhelming they may seem to be, the kind of girl who would carry her head high in adversity. The character is admirably portrayed by Miss McCoy, is one she seems to like, even to the point of showing that its greatest peril lies in its extreme expression, that of reckless self-confidence. This portrayal is so good that it makes the play a success.

The title is that of a comedy, and the construction is as unsophisticated as a Sunday School book, but its native simplicity is not distressing. Between such naivete and heavy convention the former is to be preferred. When the southern girl is to be detected, she nearly hands the detective such evidence as he desires, almost thrusts it in his face. When she becomes a detective, she is not called upon to exercise her wits to any extent. She has only to peep through a keyhole and, presto, the guilty one is detected. It is all so easy. It reminds one of those ads to lure the scenario writer which state, "no previous experience necessary." The fine southern girl has little chance to use her mental equipment.

She is active enough physically when invading the den of blackmailers, but they handle her as members of the Edison Company might handle Miss Gertrude McCoy, not as a gang of desperate crooks would handle a woman bent on their destruction, yet wholly in their power. When an empty police wagon responds to the call and policemen are supposed to emerge therefrom, one's imagination is strained to the point of headache.

Probably the most delightful thing about the Edison Company is the Edison Company of ladies and gentlemen shown in large screen visualizations. Going through the cast to pick out exceptional merit, one is confronted with it all along the line in a balance that gives dignity and consistency to the portrayal. The intelligence shown by members results in a harmony of effort which smooths the rough places of construction. The high point of excellence lies in that gathering of fine spirits and their maintenance in good relation, for they are individuals, and as such liable to clash. Miss McCoy as the lead in this story comes in contact with one group after another, yet there are no discords, no jarring notes in the acting. I am paying the performance of Edison people a high compliment when I designate it as "good music," for that is something I care more for than any screen story ever shown.

Russell Bassett

HERE is one of the real veterans of the screen. Russell Bassett has played a long time before the camera. He was on the stage many years before going into pictures, his first theatrical engagement having been at the Old Opera House, Washington street, San Francisco, forty-five years ago. He was in the original Hooley's stock company of Chicago with James O'Neill and William H. Crane. He played with Edwin Booth, Joseph Jefferson in "Rip Van Winkle," E. A. Sothern, Lester Wallack, Maggie Mitchell ,Mrs. John Drew, and Joe K. Emmett among others.

Russell Bassett.

Mr. Bassett is now a member of the Famous Players' stock company. His work as the prime minister in "Such a Little Queen" is notable. It reveals the actor of ability and experience, one who portrays a role combining comedy and drama with equal facility and effectiveness. Then, too, his agility is the admiration as well as the cause for wonder on the part of his many friends. Mr. Bassett had a role in "The Eagle's Mate," an earlier Famous Players release in which Miss Pickford was featured. He has a strong part in "Behind the Scenes." He will also be seen in forthcoming productions of the Famous Players.

Mr. Bassett has played with the Biograph, Edison, Yankee, Pathe, Imp, Reliance and Nestor companies. If he has a specialty it is in comedy roles, although he is at home in heavy, aristocratic or western parts. He can ride, swim—as we saw in "Such a Little Queen"—or row a boat, in fact, he can paddle his own canoe or anyone else's. He is a member of the Photoplayers of Los Angeles. There was some talk, of a jocular sort you may be sure, when he was proposed for honorary membership that he was "too young" to be thus singled out for unusual honors, but the proposition went through. He is always good company, and it is a fortunate man who can get him started on reminiscences of the old days and the old players.

HANNA SUCCEEDS RAPP.

M. A. Rapp, treasurer of the Moving Picture Protective Association, of Pittsburgh, Pa., has resigned that position, and M. A. Hanna, secretary of the organization, has been chosen as his successor.

WARNING.

The attention of exhibitors is called to the arrest in Vancouver, B. C., of a man giving the name of C. A. Allen, who has been representing himself throughout Western Canada as being a representative of the Mutual Film Corporation of New York. As far as can be learned Allen never had any connection with the Mutual or with any of its allied companies. His method has been to obtain money and credit on the strength of his alleged connections with the Mutual Film Corporation. There have been several cases in Vancouver where irresponsible persons have obtained money from merchants, representing that they would advertise them through the motion picture theaters upon payment of a given sum and then taking French leave. Allen was arrested, charged with jumping his board bill at the Hotel Canada after representing himself as being employed by the Mutual, and was remanded to jail for two weeks pending trial.

"The Invisible Power"

A Four-Part Kalem Production Contains a Variety of Inter-

Revised by George Blaisdell.

Revised by George Blaisdell.

THOUGHT transference is the underlying theme in this strong four-part Kalem story. Two masterful wills clash for the control of a young woman susceptible to hypnotic influence. One desires to protect her from again falling under the evil domination of the man who had taken her from her home. "The Invisible Power" brings upon the screen many of the Kalem's best western players. It is a fine cast, selected with a keen eye to the demands of the individual parts and the ability and typical characteristics of the players to meet those demands. At the head is William H. West, who portrays an army surgeon interested in the study of hypnotism and also human nature as it may be found in the border communities, in which his life is cast. Against the surgeon is Lorenzo, a dance hall proprietor, portrayed by Paul C. Hurst. Cleo Ridgeley plays the part of Mabel Whitney, a girl of the dance hall, who is injured in a melee, suffering loss of memory. She is the subject upon which the surgeon so successfully experiments, proving his contention that in proper, wholesome, moral surroundings Mabel is all a young woman should be. Mr. West gives a splendid performance—he shows us the benevolent surgeon who can be stern when occasion demands. Mr. Hurst is a convincing bad man. He plays all of his part, without overplaying it. Miss Ridgeley is a long-time screen player, and her work shows skill as well as experience; she inspires sympathy and interest right at the beginning, and through marked personal charm sustains them throughout.

Scene from "The Invisible Power" (Kalem).

Producer Melford has given us a good all-around picture. His players add to the atmospheric quality, as before intimated. There is Thomas Gillette, the cabman, for instance, who furnishes a fine bit. James W. Horne, the piano player, has but a moment on the screen, but the moment bulks big with life. Frank Jonasson as Sergeant Whitney, the father of the girl led astray, gives a most feeling interpretation. Jane Wolfe, too, as the wife of the surgeon, shares the honors.

There are stirring situations. One of the more sensational is the fight in the dance hall, especially after the lights are shot out. The pistol flashes in the darkened room give a sufficiently vivid representation of what the real thing may be to satisfy the ordinary adventure seeker. There is real drama in the meeting of Sergeant Whitney with the daughter who does not recognize him. Another moment of marked strength is the discovery of Mabel by Lorenzo, following his journey to the army post in search of her. The fourth part is the best of all. The tragic encounter between Lorenzo and Whitney, resulting in the death of the former, clears the air and brings happiness to those deserving it.

CARYL FLEMING INJURED.

Caryl Fleming, playing juvenile leads with the Pierrot Film Company at its studio in Tappan, N. Y., was seriously hurt last week by being thrown from an automobile. A machine coming from behind collided with Mr. Fleming's car and threw it into a ditch.

Syd Chaplin

SYD CHAPLIN, the great English comedian, brother of Charles Chaplin (the funny drunk), of Keystone fame, has signed up with the Keystone Company and left New York for the Los Angeles studios recently.

Syd Chaplin was born in Cape Town on St. Patrick's Day, 1885. He went on the stage at an early age, appearing in a dramatic production, "The Two Little Drummer Boys." When sixteen years old he left the stage and became a seafaring man. After several years of a sailor's life he secured an engagement with Charles Frohman's "Sherlock Holmes" company. From this beginning he made an entry into vaudeville being given a small part in a comedy sketch "Repairs." His part in this called for a street corner socialistic speech to working men. Chaplin made it a comedy drunk part which proved to be the hit of the show.

Syd Chaplin.

When Fred Karno saw Chaplin in this characterization he gave him a year's contract and sent him to join the American Company as the conjurer in "A Night in a London Music Hall" and as understudy to the comedy drunk. Chaplin did not get an opportunity to play that part here, but after sixteen weeks he returned to England with the company and was there made principal comedian of the London company, working for eight years in Mr. Karno's various sketches.

Just how successful Syd Chaplin will be in pictures is still a matter of conjecture, but it is believed that he will prove about as funny as his distinguished brother Charles. The announcements of the first releases in which he appears will be awaited with interest.

PAULINE FREDERICK WITH FAMOUS PLAYERS.

It has been definitely announced that Pauline Frederick is under exclusive contract with the Famous Players Film Company, for whom she is to appear in a series of important film productions. The Famous Players will present Pauline Frederick in her first motion picture characterization, within a short time, in the motion picture version of Henri Bernstein's emotional drama "Sold." A little later she will also be seen in the Famous Players mammoth and spectacular film production of Hall Caine's masterwork, "The Eternal City," which was produced in Italy during the past summer with this star.

A Six-Reel Alco Feature, Produced by the California Motion Picture Corporation.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

TAKEN from Armstrong's dramatization, "Salomy Jane," has more of the splendid dramatic instinct, keen insight into character and broad sympathy of the real author, Francis Bret Harte. There is a great deal in the stories of Bret Harte well suited to visualization on the screen. Their unconventionality, their striking contrasts of circumstance and character, offer unusual opportunity to the photoplaywright, whereas they are rarely suited to stage presentation.

Like most of these stories, "Salomy Jane" is filled with strongly-marked elemental types—"Yuba Bill," "Marbury," "Larrabee," "Madison Clay," and "Colonel Starbottle," and like them it gives free play to instinct and passion. What he did with language to throw a glamour over rude frontier life the photodrama has done with softening and idealistic effects of artistry. Many of the backgrounds are a delight to the eye, and not a few of them positively beautiful. This beauty of scene, aided by exceptionally fine photography, and a wise selection of types, constitute the screen story's chief values. Whatever there is in it of the theater is rather to its detriment than to its advantage.

"Salomy Jane" is a story of rude and wild hearts, tempestuous in feud, quick and bitter in resentment. There is plenty of gun-play and a love story that becomes more and more interesting toward the close. Then "Salomy Jane" and an un-named "Man" are fairly driven into an elopement, driven by the shotguns and rifles of vigilantes. They escape on one horse over rough country to a river and there take to a boat. Impressive scene is that of their coming head-on toward the spectators with a crowd of mounted men following and hooting, dashing through the shallow water while the hero rows for his life. He and the heroine turn a bend and abandon their boat, but they deceive their pursuers by taking to the river again behind a floating log. This is only one of a series of spirited pictures leading up to the conventional happy ending.

The general impression of this feature is one of beauty combined with outdoor activity and its general wholesomeness. It is a story of common humanity, generous to those ordinarily supposed to be callous, warmed by positive passions and quick sympathies. It should meet with decided success wherever shown in this country or abroad.

Beatriz Michlena appeared in the name part and House Peters impersonated Jack Dart, "the Man."

"SALOMY JANE" BEFORE A CRITICAL AUDIENCE.

"Salomy Jane" was shown on Tuesday morning, October 27, to a critical audience at the Broadway Theater, New York, and was well received. A feature of the performance was the musical accompaniment. The music was arranged by B. A. Rolfe and directed by him. The audience seemed deeply absorbed in the story. It laughed with Colonel Starbottle and was thrilled by the many exciting episodes.

Among those present were Job E. Hedges, Mabel Taliaferro, and her husband Thomas J. Carrigan, Onoto Watanna, Miss Ethel Kelly, Miss Louise Dutton and Mrs. Sarah Bosse.

Mildred Harris

MONG the children of the films who have made good with the producers and the world at large is dainty Mildred Harris, who is now permanently connected with the Oz Film Co., at the Hollywood studios. She is appearing in child leads, under the direction of J. Farrel McDonald, and has already made quite a name for herself in connection with L. Frank Baum's fairy tales. In the latest production, "The Scarecrow," this charming little actress made quite a hit in the role of Buttonbright, the little boy who has all the adventures with the Scarecrow. At first it was hard to recognize her, so good was her make up, with her hair bobbed, and wearing cute little trousers. In another picture she was a princess, and in this part also did exceedingly well.

Mildred Harris.

For some time Mildred has been at this studio, but formerly she was watched enthusiastically by thousands of people all over the world, in films produced by the New York Motion Picture Co., at Santa Monica. She first appeared in these films in 1912, coming from the Western Vitagraph, where she first appeared before a camera, early in 1911. Some of her best pictures were "The Pride of the South," "The Social Skeleton," "Divorce," "Grand Dad," "The Wheels of Destiny," and many others, too numerous to mention.

Cheyenne, Wyoming, was the city to welcome Mildred into this world. She was born on the 29th of November, 1901, and for her age, 13, she is about the most popular child actress on the screen today. She is an efficient swimmer, living at the beach, and rides a pony, drives an automobile, and likes to dance, being somewhat of a fancy dancer as well as a good ball room dancer. She likes to dance better than anything else, and most of her leisure time is spent in learning the latest steps of the tango and hesitation.

It not only takes practice, study, and application, but a natural talent to make the success that Mildred Harris has won for herself, and she deserves all that she receives. Possessed of all the charms of beauty, and gifts of personality, that nature can bestow, she is ideal for the pictures as well as the stage, and in addition has a mass of golden hair that has been coveted millions of times by millions of little girls Mildred takes her work as a matter of life. She puts all her energy into it, and studies all the time. It is her life work, and she is going to make her life one of fame. Of course she does not miss schooling, her mother sees to that, and with the languages, piano, dancing, and other accomplishments, Mildred will not lack for education. She has a private tutor in the winter, and her studies are well looked after.

At the present time, on account of the picture, "The Last Egyptian," this little leading lady is not working, but as soon as the Oz company resumes the production of fairy tales, she will be seen to good advantage in appropriate roles, and will ever be as popular as of yore, and even more.

"The Book of Nature"

Interesting Motion Pictures of Animal Life Taken by Professor R. L. Ditmars.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

WITH some of Professor Ditmars' excellent work the readers of The Moving Picture World were made quite familiar before any other publication had taken much notice of them. The able professor, who has shown such extraordinary qualifications for this kind of work, has now released a complete series of his pictures giving them the apt title "The Book of Nature."

The Juggling-Fly (Ditmars).

The new series deals with mammals and with reptiles and insect life. Indeed, there are glimpses into almost every corner of the animal kingdom, as enumerated by the keeper of the log on board Noah's ark. The distinguishing characteristic of the whole series is the clever and entertaining way in which the subjects are presented to the public. It is easy to make entertaining pictures educational, but to make educational pictures entertaining is a more difficult problem. Professor Ditmars has solved the problem absolutely. In the first place he was wise in the selection of his subjects. He was systematic and scientific, to be sure, but he always gave the preference to what is entertaining. Nothing that is interesting or picturesque escaped him and in every inch of his films he has cleverly emphasized the pathetic and the humorous. Thus he has made a first-class entertainment out of what might otherwise appear to be rather a dry and severe course of study.

His pictures, showing the development of the frog from the spawn to the full-grown batracchian, are replete with incident and adventure. Not one stage of this marvelous development in the workshop of Nature has been omitted; you can't help learning as you are looking, but the liveliest sensation of the spectator will always be that of being amused. In one reel, for instance, the Professor introduces us to a strange assortment of animals—all of them very curious, but little known creatures. We look and laugh and learn in one process. The singing katydid in another reel shows the comedy in the animal world. No audience can resist this exquisite appeal to its risibles.

Not a little of "The Book of Nature" is taken up with a picture of serpentine life. The Professor is an expert on snakes and has, as an author on this subject, achieved an international reputation. The creeping creatures, mysterious to most of us and more or less terrible, are familiar to the professor. He knows their traits and their haunts. He is a splendid director of animals and he knows how to make his reptiles go through their paces. He places every animal in its native environment and makes it feel natural and comfortable before he trains his camera on it. Hence the unique pictures he is able to obtain. He shows the various kinds of serpents from the harmless gartersnake to the deadly cobra. He next goes into the habits of the creatures, showing their way of seizing and feeding upon their prey. "The Book of Nature" follows this method all through its pages.

The last reel is the one that will afford the greatest amusement. All the animals are assembled to witness a performance of the "Jungle Circus Company." The toads and frogs are solemnly seated upon toadstools and all the rest of the "animal public" are in similar positions of eager expectancy. Presently the performance begins. A curious-looking chameleon with eyes that look in different directions at the same time does nothing but act natural and immediately "brings down the house." Frogs perform on the tight rope with unqualified success, the snake "does stunts," the salamander smiles in a most bewitching way, the anteaters and hedgehogs and the bats go through their antics and presently the housefly, aided by a tremendously powerful microscope, shows what he can do as an acrobat and a weight-carrier, when the enjoyable proceedings are interrupted by the appearance of a skunk. A stampede follows. The snakes wiggle away as fast as they can, you see turtles hurrying and frogs jumping and all kinds of panicky creeping and gliding and jumping. The skunk remains in possession of the field and the great circus ends.

The pictures, I will say in conclusion, are splendid in photography, on the earth, in the air, on the water and under the water. For the ideal educational film the Ditmars pictures have made a record which it will be difficult to surpass.

"Behind the Scenes"

Miss Pickford in Five-Part Famous Players Story of Stage Life Gives One of Her Best Performances.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IN her work in "Behind the Scenes" Mary Pickford makes deep appeal to the heart. With full realization of the unwisdom that prompts comparison the writer is tempted to say that nothing in which Miss Pickford has appeared since "Caprice" quite so strongly sways the emotions. Margaret Mayo's story of stage life might well have been written with Miss Pickford in mind for the interpreter of the chief part, so well does the versatility of the actress match the character of Dolly Lane, musical comedy soubrette. Dolly is light-hearted and sunny at nearly all times; but she can pout, and when she feels strongly she can rage, too. The charm of the play does not lie solely in the story. Running through the characterization are deft touches, slight in themselves, but counting much in the aggregate.

"Behind the Scenes" is for the screen even more than for the stage. There is a short cast. The action is clear and consecutive; there are no doubts as to whys and wherefores. James Kirkwood, who directs the picture, has the role of Steve Hunter, the young man who goes from the farm to the city, marries an actress, fails in business and goes back to simple life in the country. Mr. Kirkwood's portrayal is virile, dignified. Lowell Sherman is Teddy Harrington, the friend of Steve and Dolly. Harrington is a man of the city; he knows human nature, and he understands the art of reconciling diverse ambitions. Russell Bassett is Joe Canby, a "bald-headed old roue," who makes things unpleasant for the actress. Mr. Sherman and Mr. Bassett finely complete the quartet of principals.

The story is not entirely of the city and of the stage. There are scenes of farm yard and hay fields. It is of the latter that the actress tires. Her life has been filled too full of the stir of the metropolis to find content with the humdrum of work and limited companionship, even when that includes the man she loves. It is only when she returns to her former career behind the footlights that she sees things with a clearer vision. After her experience with Canby in the locked dressing room she is ready to give up stage work just as success, the success for which through poverty she had fought, comes to her.

The subject is elaborately staged. The interior of the theater and its audience and performers constitutes but an incident in the making of a worth-while production. "Behind the Scenes" is well done from script to screen.

By Himself.

ONLY three years in photoplay, with an inconspicuous beginning with one company, would ordinarily mean a limited amount of experience in the work, but I think I can put in a claim for a graduate's diploma—that is, so far as having passed the grammar grades. I never expect to be wholly finished.

Instead of spending my vacation away from the city I joined a friend and got a chance to play small parts at the Lubin studio for Colonel Joseph Smiley. Summer lapsed into autumn and then winter came. I was still increasing my experience as a screen player. One thing led to another until George Terwilliger gave me my first leading part in his play "The Cry of the Blood." Last winter he chose me to go to St. Augustine with his special company where I played a succession of important parts and had some unforgettable escapes. I wouldn't mention them if they had been the usual exaggerations of the ordinary press agent, for an actor in the pictures is expected to attach no importance to the daily risk of his life.

But this was one degree more risky. A yacht was loaded with oil and set afire, the conflagration timed so that it would end with the explosion of a chest of powder. I was left aboard, with orders to jump into the water at a certain moment. With fire raging behind me and the powder due to explode within a minute, I hesitated to plunge over the rail. Why? Because I saw three sharks swimming near the surface. I could either be blown to smithereens or be nibbled by the sea beasts. I plunged. By some miracle the sharks did not attack me. I am back at the Philadelphia studio, unscathed and happy. I like to specialize in wayward sons, dissolute brothers and bad boys generally. My ambition, however, is to abandon acting altogether and produce light comedies.

ROBERT WARWICK IN "ALIAS JIMMY VALENTINE"

The much coveted role of Jimmy Valentine for the World Film Corporation motion picture version of the famous play, "Alias Jimmy Valentine," has been allotted to Robert Warwick, who has made the greatest progress in the favor of the picture fans. In "The Dollar Mark" and "The Man of the Hour," Mr. Warwick placed himself in the fore rank of moving picture favorites. Mr. Warwick is at present with Frances Starr, playing one of the most important roles in "The Secret," the Henri Bernstein play in which Miss Starr is appearing under the direction of David Belasco. Prior to joining the Belasco forces, Mr. Warwick was under the management of William A. Brady in various successes, but he is still under contract with Mr. Belasco. His unfilled time is to be devoted exclusively to the World Film Corporation.

Paul Armstrong had hundreds of offers for "Alias Jimmy Valentine" before he disposed of the motion picture rights to that great success to the World Film Corporation. It was only after he was assured that Mr. Warwick would be seen in the title role that he consented to dispose of the rights to his pet success.

CASINO HAS NOT CLOSED WITH ALCO.

The Casino Feature Film Company, of Detroit, Mich., informs the Moving Picture World that, up to the date of writing, it has closed no contract with the Alco company for the exclusive Michigan rights of that company's productions and requests a denial of the statement to that effect appearing in this journal on October 24.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

A BROADWAY manager heralds an innovation he calls "bargain melodrama." The cast is to be composed of well-known players and the best seats are to be sold at one dollar. This is supposed to be a cut from two dollars. In justifying the cut the manager states that the business of regular houses has been hurt by the moving picture theaters, so far as the balcony and gallery trade is concerned, because people will not buy those seats when they can get orchestra seats in the picture houses for less money.

This is an explanation of the loss of patronage by the regular theaters that does not explain. The inroads the photoplay theaters have made upon the box office receipts of the regular houses have not been due to the cheaper prices charged by the former. The people who paid balcony and gallery prices at the regular theaters are not paying seventy-five cents and a dollar to the photoplay houses, nor will they pay a dollar for the privilege of returning to the regular theaters. Whatever patronage the photoplays have taken from the regular theaters on account of lower prices has been that of the two dollar orchestra seat class. The real explanation for the inroads made by the photoplays upon the receipts of the regular houses is that the gallery, balcony and orchestra people discovered there was a rapid deterioration in the quality of shows given in the latter houses and they could get more and better for their money in the picture houses.

The hold secured by the photoplays upon the amusement-seeking people cannot be shaken by cut-rate announcements of the regular theaters. Confidence was shattered by the apparent indifference on the part of the latter as to the quality of the shows and until merit is re-established in those theaters and the managers can satisfy the people that they give as good as the photoplay houses do, the latter will hold the business they are now getting. More than that, the photoplay houses will hold their own regardless of any re-establishment on the part of the others. The same audiences do not patronize the higher-class picture houses night after night. So the latter places will not suffer should people eventually go back to the regular houses on off nights.

The motion picture houses, however, must come to a realization of the fact that one of the factors that helped bring patronage to them was a change of program and their patrons are manifesting a desire for more changes. Indications are that long runs are fast becoming things of the past. In the days of "Quo Vadis" and similar productions there was a novelty that attracted the higher class of patrons to an extent that many of them patronized the same production several times. But, like the patrons of the cheaper houses, they have acquired a taste for "more, but something different." This sentiment has been discovered by the managers of many of the large photoplay houses.

This being the case it behooves the photoplay managers to become more active and not give even alert managers of the regular houses a chance to take patronage from them. They cannot afford to book a good thing and rest upon their oars. A theater that ranked among the leading regulars last season and opened as a photoplay house this season booked for a term of weeks a photoplay that has made big money. The management did not realize that there was a limit to the regular and transient patronage of the house and, too late, discovered that the booking term was too long. The result was that matinees are now advertised at 5 and 10 cents, which puts the theater on a plane with the small houses in the vicinity. It is a good thing for the latter, because they have a daily change of program. The fault is not with the attraction at the former regular house, but arises from lack of judgment in the booking. The same photoplay has been running to big business for several weeks in another house of this city, but there is a vast difference in location and the patronage. The regular and transient trade is much greater.

Reverting to the popularity of photoplays, conversation with a gentleman prominently connected with the Professional Women's League, disclosed that interest in photoplays on the part of people of the higher class is constantly increasing. "Many members of the organization," said he, "are moving picture fans and a change of program at the better class of houses always attracts them. It is their belief that the people of today have but a meager conception of the silent drama possibilities." The League has become so interested in photoplays that a part of each meeting is to be set aside for discussion of the past, present and future of them. Representatives from all the prominent producing companies are to be invited to make addresses. At the November meeting Mr. Vandyke Brooke, of the Vitagraph company, will speak on the dramatic end of the business and Miss Flora Finch, of the same company, is to talk on the comedy work. The League has been fortunate in securing Mr. Brooke. He is one of the oldest screen actors, producers and writers in the field. His experience in and study of the business makes him exceptionally qualified for such an occasion.

The interest thus taken by the Professional Women's League in the motion picture field will be gratifying to all the legitimate producers and exhibitors engaged in the business. It will result in the bringing out of ideas that will tend to further the advancement of the photoplay standard. It will also bring to the front questions regarding the future of the business which thus far the most interested people have not been able to agree upon. For instance, some people maintain that motion pictures will attain the acme of success only when a simultaneous production of the voices with the movements of the characters upon the screen will have been perfected. One of the League members discourages this view to the extent that the same degree of success will be maintained when more attention is given to music in connection with photoplays. With good subjects, appropriate music and opportune effects the performance is complete. The musical part of programs is sadly neglected, the members said. Music is there, but it is not in the right place. It shows no intelligence, or thought. The same attention should be given to the arrangement of music for each photoplay as is given to the details of the play itself. To emphasize the point the League member said: "Suppose we take a scene touching upon war, and when a body of allies is shown marching to battle the orchestra, or pianist, plays 'Tipperary'—can you imagine the inspiration given the audience? Yes, I have in mind President Wilson's desires regarding the preservation of neutrality, but I cannot think of a more suitable illustration of the value of appropriate and timely music to the proper production of motion pictures. No doubt the enthusiasm of the audience would be aroused if the same body of troops passed to the old-time tune of 'Marching Through Georgia' or 'Maryland,' but those tunes, perhaps, would not be up to date, or in keeping with the picture shown. I do not say that special music should be written for each new subject. Old-time music will, in many cases, catch and please the audience more than modern selections. My contention is that 'Down Upon the Suwanee River' will not give to a play dealing with foreign situations the same tone that some particular foreign selection will give. All must be in harmony, not excepting the instruments providing the selections. I predict that musical departments will, eventually, and at no distant date, become one of the most important of the better class of photoplay producing companies. I have talked with some of the older producers concerning this matter and they have stated that the idea is not a new one; that for several years some companies have suggested to exhibitors musical selections appropriate to certain scenes, but most exhibitors have been negative in the matter. Many of them have taken the view that the suggestions were made in the interest of music publishers. The real obstacle to progress in this direction has been that the matter has not been properly presented to the exhibitors. When it is they will lay in a supply of music, and when they are shown that one sheet of music is not appropriate for the entire subject, but that the accompaniment must come from a variety of selections and at specific times, they will begin to get interested. I look forward to the time when photoplay studios will be looking for people in the musical world who will be able to intelligently arrange selections for the plays. Up to date there has been generalization in most of the musical suggestions and the exhibitors have failed to grasp the true import of them."

ALLEGES INJURY FROM NOXIOUS GASES.

An unusual suit has ben filed in the United States District Court at Minneapolis, Minn., against the Mutual Film Corporation by Paul Cullinan. Cullinan, who says he was employed by the exchange as shipping clerk, asks $25,000 damages because the proper precautions were not taken by his employers to protect him from the noxious gases emanating from the films he handled.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Axes to Grind?

I HAVE just received, though not direct, the following circular letter sent out by Cleveland, O., Local No. 1, of the M. P. E. L. of America, bearing the date of Oct. 23:

"Dear Sir:

"This is to advise that the following resolution was this date passed by the Cleveland Local No. 1, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America:

"'Whereas, it has been announced that a Trade Journal in behalf of the Motion Picture Business has been proposed and is about to be launched by Mr. Neff, Mr. Kohl, Mr. Vestal and Mr. Wilson.

"'Be it resolved, that we absolutely condemn the attempt of anyone using their office with or without intent to take advantage of their official position for the purpose of aiding their private enterprises.

"'Be it further resolved, that, if Mr. Vestal and Mr. Wilson propose to publish such a Journal, that they immediately resign from the Censor Board, and Mr. Neff resign from the State Presidency of the League, and Mr. Kohl as National Vice President of Ohio.

"'Be it further resolved, that a copy of this resolution be sent to Trade Journals and all interested parties.'"

When Mr. Mayer, formerly of the Billboard, was seen in this city last he informed me that the Ohio state branch was about to publish such a paper, a resolution to that effect having been introduced and passed in the Ohio state convention, the proceedings of which Mr. Mayer had reported for a New York paper. Mr. Mayer also stated that he had been appointed editor of the proposed publication.

This circular reveals quite a different status of conditions, although the mere fact of exhibitors issuing a trade paper, whether as an organization, or by the combination of a few individual exhibitors, is not, in my opinion, sound policy. Such a publication cannot escape the charge of being subsidized no more than could a publication that is owned and edited by manufacturers.

The old Film Index, strong and popular in its day, was abandoned on the very ground of subsidization; because—though it might be ever so fair and honest—it always had hanging over it the cloud of suspicion that the manufacturers' interests only were being considered. The Licensed manufacturers saw this and sold out their interests, leaving the field to neutral publishers.

Can my friends, Messrs. Neff, Vestal, Wilson and Kohl escape the charge of having an axe to grind? The accompanying circular is evidence that they cannot; and that impression will keep on growing, not only in the minds of exhibitors, but in the minds of the other big factors in the business.

What is the logical conclusion of the whole matter? Exhibitors to exhibiting; manufacturers to manufacturing, and publishers to publishing.

Reorganization of Celebrated Players Film Co.

Owing to the heavy managerial task imposed by his steadily increasing theatrical enterprises, Alfred Hamburger has resigned active interest in the Celebrated Players Film Co.

At the annual meeting held last week, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Felix F. Feist, president and general manager; Louis M. Selig, vice-president and treasurer, and Samuel L. Franklin, secretary. On the board of directors are: Felix F. Feist, Louis M. Selig and Alfred Hamburger.

The Celebrated Players Film Co. has acquired the exclusive rights to the Alliance program for the state of Illinois. In addition to this output the firm will handle high-class features of various makes. Such big winners as "Neptune's Daughter," "Sealed Orders," "Brewster's Millions," etc., are now on the list for bookings.

In selecting Mr. Feist for president and general manager, the company has shown both good judgment and fine appreciation of his attainments. Mr. Feist has a strong personality and his dealings with one and all are marked by urbanity and upright methods.

Lake Forest's Fashionable Set in Pictures.

One of Essanay's Eastern companies is at present engaged in the production of a story adapted from "The Crimson Wing," a book treating of the Franco-Prussian war, which was written by Hobart C. Chatfield-Taylor about 12 years ago.

It is said that a fine photoplay adaptation of the book has been made, and it can be forecast that the subject, when completed, will be most timely and thrilling.

About 50 members of the Essanay Co. are engaged in making the pictures, and the social set of Lake Forest, a suburb of Chicago, will be largely drawn upon in several of the scenes.

The opening scenes are being taken in the grounds surrounding the palatial home of Harold McCormick, one of Chicago's well-known millionaires and society men. Many leaders of Chicago's most fashionable set are taking a practical interest in the production, although their names will not appear in the cast.

Most of the fall and part of the winter will be taken up by the production. All the scenes will be staged in Lake Forest; the first, as has been stated, being taken on Mr. McCormick's grounds. The second reel will be taken on the estate of Mrs. Orville Babcock, and later on Mrs. Scott Durand's Crab Tree farm will be visited. Here the great battle scenes will be produced.

It is not known as yet how many reels the subject will require, but everyone interested believes that the films will form a fine feature subject.

Chicago Censorship Under Fire.

Major Funkhouser, head of the Chicago censor board, has got into hot water recently, because he has presumed to cut films based on the stories of Dickens, Hawthorne, etc. William L. Chenery, in the Chicago Herald, humorously connects these incidents with the tremendous interest taken in the works of these authors just now, as shown by the rush made on the Chicago public library. Here is one of his articles that is well worth reading:

Henry E. Legler, city librarian, has reason to laugh. Mr. Legler is always attempting to persuade his public to read "high brow" literature. Every time a volume of Dickens, or Shakespeare, or another of the classic writers goes out, the recording angel of good librarians puts down a meritorious mark for Mr. Legler.

Just now a raid is being made on the Dickens collection at the public library. A little while ago it was Nathaniel Hawthorne. A few months before it was the Shakespeare shelf. Mr. Legler wondered if Chicago was going Boston. Then somebody tipped off the secret.

It was Major Metellus L. C. Funkhouser. Major Funkhouser had been bestowing consorious frowns upon the works of the worthies of literature, and what the public could not see in pictures it determined to read in books. And so, quite unconsciously, the indefatigable guardian of movie morals ushered in a wave of culture and erudition.

On Oct. 14 a part of the film showing Martin Chuzzlewit was cut out by the censors. On the same day the film staged for the American Woman Suffrage Association, called "Your Girl and Mine," was ordered shortened by Major Funkhouser in person.

Now, up until Oct. 14, nobody ever ventured an opinion that Charles Dickens was a corrupter of morals. On that day, however, the second deputy superintendent of police discovered the novelist's innate depravity, and Chicago was saved. "The Scarlet Letter" had been vised similarly and "The Merchant of Venice" had got through with difficulty.

"Your Girl and Mine" already had been passed by the national board of censorship in New York. It had been submitted to the approval of a number of high-minded women, and none of them had been shocked or led astray. Yet the second deputy superintendent of police thought the city might be corrupted and ordered cut-outs.

These actions indicate the stupidity which characterizes moving picture censorship. Is it not time to face the situation frankly and to throw the entire institution overboard if it is found to be worthless.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Wm. N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Co., left for Los Angeles Thursday evening, Oct. 22, where he will remain for several weeks.

Samuel S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Co., left for Santa Barbara Sunday, Oct. 25. Mrs. Hutchinson will remain in the city during the fall.

L. J. Weis, owner of the Electrical Theater, Naperville, Ill., visited the World office last week. The Electrical seats 180 people. An admission of 10 cents is charged for a program of four reels of Licensed service. He stated that he was also running "Trey o' Hearts" to very fine business. Mr. Weis has bought a lot in Naperville, on which he intends building a moving picture theater that will seat not less than 450 people.

The Chicago office of Warner's Features, Inc., has been removed from 37 S. Wabash avenue to more spacious quarters in Suite 400-402, Shops Building, 17 N. Wabash avenue. The new offices are elaborately furnished, and well equipped to handle the growing business. More than half of the floor space is given to the shipping department, the inspection room, and a private projection room. The remaining space is used for the business offices, which comprise four private offices and a reception room. It is the intention that the Chicago office will superintend the management of the other eight Western branch offices, as soon as arrangements can be made. David J. Chatkin, well known in the business, is the manager.

Maxwell Cohn, traveling representative of the Treble-Clef Motion Picture Co., of New York City, arrived in the city Thursday, Oct. 22, and remained until Saturday afternoon, when he left for the Minnesota state convention held Tuesday and Wednesday, Oct. 27 and 28. As recent advertisements in the Moving Picture World have announced, Mr. Cohn is calling on state right buyers throughout the United States, in the interests of his firm. While in the city Mr. Cohn gave exhibitions in the Pastime Theater, on W. Madison street, and in the Lincoln Theater, one of the finest houses in the city. He stated that the novelty made a big hit in both houses. It is Mr. Cohn's intention to present his novelty to Minnesota exhibitors several times during the run of the convention. The novelty introduced by Mr. Cohn is the old song slide in a new form, the only difference being that the scenes are projected on the screen from a film, instead of from slides.

Francis X. Bushman, the popular Essanay photoplay star, gave a large double-box party at the Auditorium one night last week, at a performance of "John Bunny in Funnyland." John's expansive face beamed with smiles as he recognized Mr. Bushman and the members of his party.

"Neptune's Daughter" concluded its remarkable run of 24 weeks at the Fine Arts theater, Friday, Oct. 23. It was succeeded on the following day by "The Path Forbidden," an Excelsior feature in which Octavia Handworth appears in the leading role. This subject will be run at the Fine Arts for one week, after which it will be transferred to the Ziegfeld Theater for a run.

H. P. Wayman and J. M. Grossmith, owners of the Triangle Theater, in Hamilton Park, this city, donated one-half the gross receipts taken in Wednesday evening, Oct. 28, to the "Christmas Ship," the name given to the worthy plan originated by the Chicago Herald for the relief of the war orphans of Europe. The interest taken in the "Christmas Ship" is nation wide. M. H. DeYoung, editor and owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, notified the editor of the Herald recently that that city alone had contributed over 220,000 articles for the relief of the little sufferers and their elders. These articles filled more than 400 cases, which required 12 four-horse trucks to convey them to the railroad depot. The cases contained thousands of dresses, all new; thousands of shoes for men, women and children; thousands of babies' and children's dresses, caps and hats and hundreds of layettes made by women in San Francisco, each layette containing a complete outfit for a baby, and tied with ribbons. Many of these contributions were marked for babies unborn. The "Christmas Ship" will sail from Brooklyn November 10.

The recent circular sent out by the United Photo-Plays Co., of this city, part of which appeared in my letter, in the last issue, had the following paragraph: "We now own and operate two high class theaters in Chicago, one on the west side and one on the north side." I have found that the theater on the north side is the Clarendon, a small house seating 297 people, located on Broadway, between Sheridan Road and Grace street. This house has changed ownership five times within the past one and a half years. One owner, during that period, fled the theater in order to escape the lease, which reverted to the original owner. When I visited the house, accompanied by a friend, there were not a dozen people in it. I have not yet discovered the location of the "high class" theater on the west side, which the company owns.

Authentic Battle Pictures

Enterprise and Good Fortune Favor the Lubin Company in Getting Authentic Records from the Coast.

AMONG the remarkable contributions to kinematographic war-literature two reels of film just received at Lubin's from the battlefields of Belgium take high rank. In some respects these pictures are without an equal in the supply of war films. There are about two thousand feet of these impressive and authentic pictures. Remarkable scenes abound, among them an actual and bitter fight between Belgian and German troops in the streets of Alost, where the soldiers of the little kingdom offered such an heroic resistance to the German hosts. One feels the thrill and the danger of war as one looks at the Belgians alternately advancing and retreating cautiously peering out of their improvised barricades and getting ready to take aim and fire. One sees some of the gallant defenders drop as if in pain while others are seen to fall and lie still.

The pictures give a fearfully complete portrayal of the havoc wrought in these whilom smiling lands of Belgium. The most pathetic and surely not the least interesting scenes are those showing the long trains of Belgian refugees, bearing their scant earthly belongings with them. Women and children predominate in these fleeing masses of humanity and the spirit of cheerfulness and helpfulness visible in many of these groups is most touching. Particularly interesting are the many intimate glimpses of the Belgian forces, infantry, cavalry and artillery. The troopers of these various arms are not showy nor gorgeous, but they have a very business-like appearance and give one the impression as if they were all sting. Here in the armed ranks the same spirit of cheerfulness seems to prevail and there are many smiling faces. War with the Belgians is not all "grim-visaged." The work of the Red Cross and of the priests is shown in most convincing detail and forms not the least interesting part of these unique films from the front.

It must be added that the man who took these films often shared the dangers of the Belgian army at the front. This daring cameraman was an Englishman, Mr. A. Radclyffe Dugmore, F. R. G. S. He is a brother of a Captain Dugmore in the British army who was but recently killed in battle. Mr. Dugmore, owing to his connections, enjoyed extraordinary facilities for getting to the front. He took the pictures not for commercial gain but rather in a spirit of daring and adventure. Through a stroke of unusual luck Mr. Lubin's representatives obtained several copies of the pictures and made haste to send them to this country. They will be released soon.

Great Northern on Firing Line

Taking Pictures at the Front Under Special Permission of German War-Office.

AN honor has been bestowed upon the Great Northern Film Company by the German War Office which granted that company official permission to take pictures at the Franco-German front. It is the only company that so far has had the distinction of obtaining permission to photograph actual battle scenes of the present conflict. A number of Great Northern camera men journeyed from Copenhagen to the seat of war in automobiles, accompanied by a military escort. It is expected that this opportunity will result in very remarkable pictures, and it is the company's intention to continue taking pictures on the firing line for an indefinite period.

A series will be inaugurated, the plan being to release one reel of these genuine war pictures at a time. The first scenes that have been photographed are now on the way to New York, and will be released within the next two weeks.

PATHE WILL HAVE WAR PICTURES.

The New York Sun of Sunday, October 25th, prints a communication from one of its foreign correspondents to the effect that the Express Film Company, a connection of Pathe Freres, has been commissioned by the German Government to take official moving pictures during the course of the war. These pictures are designed to disprove, the communication states,. charges of German atrocities. Under certain conditions scenes of actual fighting are being taken. The conduct of the German soldiers after the capture of a city is being recorded by the movie man. The German Government has veiled this official recognition of the importance of motion picture records of the war with much secrecy. In the meantime, on the face of the evidence, it seems probable that Pathe on the conclusion of hostilities will have some unequalled pictures of the gigantic combat taken under the most favorable auspices.

Doings at Los Angeles

AS the result of having his head stepped on by a horse while lying on the ground, Fred Williams, one of the Universal boys, is in a serious condition in a local hospital. The accident happened at the ranch in the production of a Western picture.

The Kerrigan-Victor company with Director Jaccard has returned from a two weeks' outing at Playa Del Rey, where some desert scenes were made. Ray Gallagher and many other Universalites were on the field, and some great stuff was made. While there, the players had some thrilling experiences. The principals stayed at a hotel in Ocean Park, and enjoyed the summer resort for the two weeks.

Clune's auditorium theater beautiful will show "St. Elmo," the Balboa feature picture, on the 26th. This is practically the first time that these films will be seen here, and many people are anxiously awaiting this big film.

Out in the Ince canyon, a geological phenomenon has occurred. Caused by some subterranean passage of water, a large volume of land sank thirty feet down the side of the canyon, and the setting has been made for an ideal earthquake scene. The land just naturally slid down, straight down, and no one knows where it went to, but it's gone.

Slim A. Goddard, who has charge of the horses at the N. Y. M. P. camp in the canyon, loaned us the horses to make the trip to see the landslide, and while guiding the party, he told of the animals that are to be shipped to Miller Brothers' ranch and thence to Europe for the war; 5,000 head will go east in a short time.

"Sheriff" Arthur Mackley, of the Mutual, did a scene in the Burning Mountain country near Santa Monica for "The Miner's Peril." Several of the players were forced to go hot foot for the ocean to cool off their feet, the sulphur earth, on fire, having charred their shoes. This is another geological puzzle of California.

Will H. Lynch, who returned a few months ago from China, will depart in a few days for the Orient, going back to the studios in Shanghai. He thinks that he will secure some excellent films that have never before been made. He expects to get several war pictures also.

J. W. Johnston, who played in "The Rose of the Rancho," was knocked out for a quarter of an hour the other day when he was in a big scene. He sustained a bad cut over his left eye, which bled profusely for some time. The Lasky people are finishing this feature picture and the circus film is also nearly completed. Bessie Barriscale, who played the lead in the former picture, has been secured by Thomas H. Ince, and will soon be featured in some big pictures there, the first one to be "The Cup of Life," from the machines of C. Gardner Sullivan and the popular manager of the New York Company.

Maybe there is not class to some of the California producers. Albert W. Hale, Kalem director, has moved into Nat C. Goodwin's palatial beach home at Ocean Park. Nat is away with his company on a long tour of the country and the Kalem man is now happily at home in his big house.

Mrs. Alice Stebbins Wells, the first regular policewoman in the world, who has been a member of the local police force, is to play the lead in a big picture at the Balboa. The scenario is to be "The Policewoman," and is from the machine of Frank M. Wiltermood. Mrs. Wells has lectured in many cities, and is pretty well known throughout this land. She is still on the force, and has helped many young women in this big world. She thinks that the film will aid humanity, being a story of real life, and showing how to avoid the snares and traps that are laid for the unknowing victims.

Kathlyn Williams and Charles Clary are being featured in "The Rosary," a coming release of Selig's. Colin Campbell is producing this picture, which is planned to be one of the best releases of the month. Clary is good in his heavy leading role, that being his long suit of late.

Production is going on nicely here, but some fogs have inconvenienced the directors at intervals. At this season the ocean breezes carry high fogs inland, which lay over until afternoon, and sometimes they stay for days at a time. However, it is good when compared with the east, and the producers only smile and wait for the sun to come out.

Bob Leonard and company will depart for San Francisco in a week to get some different settings for a coming picture.

Walter Belasco has gone to Frisco for a vacation, the first in 18 months. He will work up there some of the time with Thomas H. Ince, who is doing "The Italian," an eight-reel feature, with George Beban in the lead. Director Barker is assisting him in this, the greatest picture ever put on in the western studio of this firm. In town one day Beban came near being killed when he fell from a machine in the path of an oncoming car. The motorman stopped just in time, for the star's body was just on the edge of the fender, and his life was not worth much for a few seconds, at least that is what Mr. Ince said.

Jack "Honey" Prescott has joined the Kalem at Santa Monica and is being starred in "Cornelius and the Cave Man." Ethel Teare is the woman lead. Director Hale is putting on some comedies with these two people that is making a hit with the fans.

In a Mutual picture, Dorothy Gish, the daughter of a town drunkard, crazed by jealousy, prevails upon her father to kill the minister, her lover, but the clergyman is only hugging his sister, and the picture ends happily for the girl, and the minister has saved her from her father. This picture is being produced by Director Cabanne.

We have a sad duty to perform. Several weeks ago, after the Oz Co. ran "The Scarecrow," it was stated that Violet Macmillan was a little boy, and hardly recognizable. Hardly recognizable meant that this little star was so good, and her portrayal of the little girl part, so good, that she was really another person, a child, and not the real young lady that she is. Therefore, we beg her pardon.

W. S. Hart, of "The Two-Gun Man" fame, has been resecured by the manager of Inceville. He will direct and play leads hereafter. He departed, but came back when a big purse was hung up by Mr. Ince. By the way, the contract under which this company used horses and cowboys from the Miller Brothers firm, has been cancelled, and hereafter the company will use its own stock in all pictures.

The Vitagraph studio at the beach has secured a 50-foot lot adjoining the plant and is erecting a new stage, property rooms, etc. The activities here are progressing and some good stuff is being turned out by Director Sturgeon.

Carlyle Blackwell has just completed "The Man Who Could Not Lose," by Richard Harding Davis. He will immediately begin on another story by the same author.

George Melford, Kalem's dramatic director, gave a dinner for his departing players, Marin Sais and Douglas Gerrard, and for the rest of the company. Ruth Roland leaves Marshal Neilan's comedies and goes into drama with Melford, while Miss Sais will go with Neilan for comedy.

CLARKE IRVINE.

CONVICT EXHIBITOR FOR SUNDAY SHOWING.

D. F. McPherson, proprietor of the Lyric Theater at Aberdeen, S. D., has been found guilty by a jury of breaking a state law by disturbing an assemblage of people met for religious worship in the Christian Church in Aberdeen on the night of Sunday, August 23, by exhibiting motion pictures within one mile of the church while religious services were being conducted. McPherson filed notice of an appeal to the Supreme Court. Arguments were waived by McPherson's attorney. The judge instructed the jury that no license is valid or gives the licensee any protection for giving a play or any other show on Sunday and that it made no difference in this case whether the play was a comedy or not.

DEBARS SUNDAY SHOWING OF "CREATION."

Mayor Clifford B. Wilson, of Bridgeport, Conn., sent Sergeant Regan to the Lyric theater, in that city, Sunday, October 18, with orders to arrest the manager and to cut the electric light wires in the theater if any attempt was made to show the moving picture film "Creation" as had been advertised. The picture was to be shown under the auspices of the International Bible Students' Association, which has a branch in Bridgeport.

When the Mayor's attention was called to the fact that pictures have been shown in churches on the Sabbath he said:

"I cannot interfere with anything conducted in a church in the nature of a religious ceremony or service, but I can and will prevent any such exhibitions in theaters."

"Uncle Sam" in Motion Pictures

Government Cameramen Have Made 50,000 Feet of Motion Views to Be Shown at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition—Many Government Activities to Be Exhibited.

By C. L. Linz.

VISITORS at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in 1915 will have an opportunity of viewing thousands of feet of film portraying the work done by the United States Government through its various departments and bureaus, for during the past six months or more cameramen have been sent to all parts of our domain in search of views that will not only be attractive but will tend to act as an educational medium.

Perhaps the most interesting of these will be the feature reels, several thousand feet in length, which are to be taken in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, commonly known as Uncle Sam's money shop. An opportunity will be given the visitors at the fair to see how an apparently common piece of white paper is turned into real money and how another sheet of paper goes through several processes and comes out at the end as stamps, printed, glued, and perforated, ready to be used for the transmission of letters, packages and what not, through the mails. A trip through the Bureau constitutes one of the most important parts of a tourist's itinerary.

Next in importance to this, from a middle west standpoint, will be the activities of the Reclamation Service, which has in charge the reclamation of arid and waste lands throughout the country. The three or four thousand feet of views recently obtained by W. S. Cowling, cameraman of the Interior Department, will show the methods followed in the building of canals, the operation of the irrigation works and the management of irrigated farms. Mr. Cowling was also successful in obtaining some very good Indian scenes.

E. B. Thompson has just returned from a tour of Alaska, to which territory he went on one of the Government vessels. He was remarkably successful in obtaining much good material, including seal fishing and the methods followed to prevent the killing off of these valuable little animals, particularly in Behring Sea, and, in fact, covering everything that country has to offer in the way of agricultural, mining and educational projects. In all, Mr. Thompson has secured about 8,000 feet of film.

W. S. Clime, of the Department of Agriculture, has just returned from a very extensive trip covering a three months' stay in the West, paying special attention to forestry and agency work conducted by his department, as well as a number of good Indian scenes. During his travels he was able to obtain some very thrilling forest fire scenes which include the activities of the forest rangers who patrol the wooded sections and act as emergency firemen. His contribution will reach in the neighborhood of six thousand feet of film.

"Ellis Island," made by Louis S. Williams, contains much good material showing the initial entrance of some of the many thousands of immigrants who yearly pass through the station at that place. Through the courtesy of the officials in charge of the motion picture exhibits of the fair, two reels bearing on this place were run off for the benefit of The Moving Picture World correspondent and several other invited guests. No series of pictures could be more complete than these, showing as they do the incoming steamer with its horde of future citizens; the warping of the huge boat into its berth on the North River by the use of a battery of tugboats, and then the disembarkation of the passengers. Views are also shown of the medical examination given immigrants, particularly with respect to eye diseases, one of the greatest causes for rejection; the counting of money, to see that each person has sufficient capital to start them on their way, and its exchange into the coinage of Uncle Sam; the court of last appeal before which cases out of the ordinary are brought. One scene of the latter depicts the marital troubles of an Italian and his pseudo-wife; another shows the rejection of a young immigrant, an imbecile, and the agreeing of his parents and sister to return to the Old World rather than desert him in the Land of Promise. Other views are of the heating and lighting plant on the Island, of the famous kissing post at which relatives and friends are allowed to meet the newcomers, the ferry boat that carries them into the City of New York, and finally the taking up of the trail to the places to which they are destined.

Louis J. Simons has been busily engaged in the taking of scenes incident to the Light House Service and the Public Health Service, being stationed in New York for several weeks for this purpose. Mr. Simons is also photographing many views in and around Washington, for it is planned to have the latter series illustrate physical Washington, including the many public buildings, street and park scenes, etc., as well as many interiors. At present only outdoor work is being accomplished, but later on when the weather becomes more severe, the interior work will be taken up. This series also includes some very fine views of President Wilson, showing him leaving the front entrance of the White House, entering his automobile and smiling and lifting his hat to those who grouped themselves about the cameraman. Not only will the whys and wherefores of the Federal Government be filmed, but some little attention will be given to the government of the District of Columbia and in this respect several thousand feet will be devoted to the public schools, showing methods of physical training, kindergarten work, instruction in gardening and industrial and manual training. There is also to be included a one-reel feature, Pandora's Box, adapted for moving pictures and staged by two young school teachers, the Misses Cecil B. Nortan and Geneva Johnston, and acted by members of the Grover Cleveland Grammar, the James O. Wilson, Normal and other schools. This film was originally produced to fill a want for subjects suitable for young children.

These films and many others are to be exhibited in three booths on the fair grounds. The fair officials at first decided not to allow any motion picture exhibitions there for the reason that through their popularity they would get so much patronage as to cause other exhibits to suffer. However, they relaxed in the matter of the Government. One of these rooms is to be so arranged as to allow for the giving of lectures, the other two will be devoted to continuous "performances" from ten in the morning to six in the evening, and the three will be located in the Liberal Arts, Mining and Metallurgy, and Machinery Buildings. The entire 50,000 feet of film to be shown will be devoted entirely to governmental subjects and there will be eight or ten men on the ground at all times to explain the work portrayed. Each room, capable of accommodating three hundred people, will be equipped with two projecting machines, these to be of the best type obtainable, in charge of two operators. The work of preparing the films and their exhibition is in charge of C. J. Boykin, assistant to the chairman of the Government exhibit board.

POSTOFFICE OFFICIALS INSPECT ESSANAY PLANT.

Col. Leroy T. Stewart, superintendent of delivery of the Chicago postoffice, and several Washington postal officials visited the Essanay laboratories, 1333 Argyle street, on Tuesday, Oct. 13, to study the method of making motion pictures in order to perfect the government photographing system. The Washington officials took motion pictures of the Chicago postoffice, showing the process a letter goes through from the time it is dropped in the box until it is delivered. The pictures will be displayed at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The officials who visited the Essanay factory with Col. Stewart are W. R. Spillman, superintendent general delivery system of Washington; James H. Callan, his assistant; W. S. Clime, in charge of the Washington department of photographic illustration, and J. T. Lynch, assistant superintendent of mails, Chicago.

THEATRE MANAGER HAS "WAR" EXPERIENCE.

Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Murray, of Oklahoma City, have just returned from an extended-trip to Europe, necessarily shortened by the war. They relate many interesting experiences encountered in their endeavor to get out of Switzerland, where they were when hostilities began, through France and back to the good old United States. Mr. Murray says he has an armful of documents of various kinds and from various police and consular officials calculated to prove his identity beyond any possible doubt. Mr. Murray operated two picture theaters in Oklahoma prior to going abroad, but his first introduction to the picture business was in the employ of the Kalem Company several years ago.

WAR NEGATIVE STOLEN.

A picture founded on the sketches of the war in Belgium made by Harry Palmer, has been stolen from the Centaur studios at Bayonne, N. J. The picture is entitled "The Siege of Liege," in one reel, and the theft is believed to have occurred on the night of Tuesday, October 13. The loss of the picture is heightened by the fact that Harry Palmer, the cartoonist and war correspondent, who conceived the project, is now on his way back to the United States, so that the work cannot be duplicated. Mr. Horsley has offered a liberal reward for the return of the pictures and no questions asked.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

"DRAMATIZED" MUSIC.

M. LEWIS, of Buffalo, asks me: "What is 'dramatized music?' Also, how does one dramatize music? I have noticed the expression in connection with playing for the picture, and would like to learn just what it means and how it is done."

You might have added—"why and when?" To the best of my knowledge and belief the expression is confined wholly to moving picture musicians and has come into use in recent years. I know I have been in the show business longer than I care to admit just now, and I never heard the term "dramatizing" as applied to music until four or five years ago. Every new line of business evolves a nomenclature of its own to meet new conditions, and this is a case in point. Without attempting a definition, I will try to explain the expression as I have heard it used:

1st—Pianists and organists often speak of "dramatizing the pictures" or "dramatizing the music" (the terms given seem to be interchangeable), when referring to music fitted to the scenes and incidents of the pictured play. This may be "improvised" or played from notes, but in either case the music is descriptive of the dramatic points—or at any rate, the more important dramatic points—contained in the story. In other words, he is playing to the picture, and wishes to make a distinction between that and playing any old thing that may sound nice but has nothing in common with the sentiment of the play.

2nd—Orchestra leaders, finding it inexpedient to jump around from one descriptive bit to another (as does the more flexible organ or piano), often get better results—for orchestral work—by changing the expression (tempo and volume) of the number being played at the time. This is practically the same thing as "humoring" the music—a procedure so often advocated on this page.

For example, a "Valse lento," a "Reverie" or "Meditation" are usually appropriate for quiet or sentimental scenes, the music being soft and legato. Certain of these may—when the scene demands—be accelerated to the point where they become decidedly agitated in character. A simple 2-4 rondo played leggiero and mezzo forte conveys an idea of sprightliness, while the same number may often be slowed down, played legato and softly to fitly accompany a quiet or sentimental scene. It is not to be understood that all numbers can be made to fit any situation, but that there are many compositions which may be "humored" (or dramatized) by changing the tempo and expression, and thus express more than one sentiment.

Orchestra leaders who thus "dramatize" their music are likewise playing to the pictures.

National Songs Again.

Another letter (signed H. Le Roy) is much to the same purport as the one quoted in issue of October 17 under the heading "Patriotic Songs." To this correspondent and any others who may be interested, I want to call attention to the fact that the U. S. Government has issued a notice that no National or patriotic music of the European countries involved shall be played so long as the war lasts. I haven't given the exact wording of the order—though I can give it if anybody wants to see it—but that is the gist of it, and leaves no room for any argument. Now, will you be neutral!

Professional Copies.

Springfield, Ohio (writer's name withheld), wants to know how to get free professional copies of music. Sometimes I feel like having an answer to this question stereotyped and keep it standing at the top of the page. But when I think it over, its serious side always appeals to me. The chief worry of the moving picture pianist—particularly in towns smaller than Columbus—is the difficulty of keeping the library up to date and sufficiently varied to interest the same audience night after night, and week after week; music is so expensive and salaries are so small. I am sorry, but I cannot aid you in procuring free professional copies from the publishers nor any one else. The only way is to write direct to the publisher, state your case and leave it up to them. Miss Florence L. Currier in the Moving Picture World of June 13, 1914, has given us her method of meeting this difficulty. You will need your manager's assistance, and you ought to have it if you are expected to keep up any sort of a library at all—unless you are one of the fortunate few whose salary is sufficient to cover the expense of new music; and in that case you don't need to worry about free professional copies.

Some Sarcasm.

The writer of this contribution might have headed his article "Don't," but he probably feared it might detract from its fine sarcastic spirit. It is entitled:

RULES FOR MOVING PICTURE DRUMMERS.

(1) Never stop drumming unless to make some other kind of noise. The audience might think you were neglecting them.

(2) Whenever a kiss is shown on the screen, always mark the point of contact with a popgun if you have one. If not, a smart stroke on the shell of the bass drum will answer. All "sob scenes"—particularly death-bed scenes are especially to be accented in this way.

(3) Never neglect an opportunity of expressing your opinion that pictures are tiresome and you would much rather be playing vaudeville.

(4) Look at the audience more than at the picture; by assuming a bored expression you convey the impression that you are much superior to your job.

(5) Pathetic scenes should be accompanied by the drum a la one step, or trot. "Rag it" in these scenes just to vary the monotony. If the "Evening Star" or "Melody in F" seem too slow for your purpose, drum good and loud; the piano player will have to come up to your tempo or stop playing.

(6) A pleasing divertissement may be introduced through a rapid tattoo on the shell of the drum or the wood blocks. This will prevent the audience from becoming too sympathetic with the heroine when her husband is brought home dead from the battle field.

(7) Never permit the music to become slow or "draggy." What they want is "pep," not funeral stuff. By keeping your back to the picture and your face to the audience you can judge when they need waking up—which will be whenever some one threatens to become absorbed in the picture-play.

(8) If you have a xylophone and play it pretty well, cut out the drums entirely and use the xylophone all through the show, playing from the violin part. If you don't play very well, this is a good place to practice in preparation for that vaudeville engagement you hope to get some day.

(9) Look with pity and contempt at all those who seem to be enjoying the pictures; you may catch their eyes and cool their enthusiasm. Remember, you cannot make it too plain that you regard anybody a "boob" who would rather see a good picture than a poor act.

(10) Have a full assortment of cow-bells, anvils, ratchets and other junk, and keep something going all the time; two or three at a time when you can. Remember the American theater-goer likes to hear those funny noises and cannot get too much of it.

Signed,

A Drummer who believes in correct music for pictures.

The writer of the above complains that a legitimate drummer has no chance in the average picture theater in competition with the fellow "who merely makes a lot of noises." He says he was criticized for remaining quiet in quiet scenes, and finally let out in favor of a man who "is either blowing, or pounding or ringing something all the time, regardless of the picture. And he is supposed to be a good moving picture drummer."

For my own part, I have not met with the extreme conditions complained of by our pessimistic friend, though I have no doubt that much of it may be true. Still, what are you going to do about it? The only place to look for sympathy and be sure of finding it, is in the dictionary—among the S's.

"Essanay Fights for 'Clean' Photoplays."

Under the above heading, the "Essanay News," for October 10th, prints in a double-column box the following:

> As Essanay was "the first to standardize photoplays," it is also taking the lead in the campaign for clean and wholesome motion pictures. The Essanay company recognizes that just as many if not more—children as adults are enthusiastic and regular patrons of photoplays. It is important to the welfare of the children that the right kind of pictures be shown in theaters—especially in neighborhood theaters. It is, therefore, important that parents know they can take their children to see an Essanay drama or an Essanay comedy without fear of encountering viciousness. Essanay is going to great expense to impress this fact upon the public. Photoplays of beauty, of upright sentiment, of the highest morals these only are being produced by Essanay. And these are the kind the public is now demanding. Hence an Essanay in your theater is a guarantee of steady patronage.

This is pleasant reading and we sincerely hope that there is more behind it than the mere press-agent stuff indicated by the last sentence. Essanay can do as well as the best when it chooses and, if it really means to "fight" and "lead in the campaign for clean and wholesome motion pictures," it can do a great deal towards putting an end to the insufferable nuisance of legal censorship. This pest is the result, not so much of the unclean and immoral picture, as it is of the pointless piffle and uneducational trash that is being turned out and labeled drama and comedy. What people want are stories with a point as well as a punch. Legal censorship agitation is simply the voicing of the popular exasperation at being obliged to put up with miles of inane rubbish when, what is wanted, and quite naturally, too, is to get an equivalent value for the money, time and brains expended in looking at the pictures. By all means, give them "photoplays of beauty, of upright sentiment, of the highest morals," but also give them something that they can keep and use—give them stories with an educational value, that will appeal to their better selves, stories with a real point so hammered in that they will carry it away with them and remember it—give them stories with a punch, not merely a sensation and thrill that raises their hair or twitches their risible muscles, but a genuine punch full of human and heart interest that will reach and warm the cockles of their hearts and will give them a cheerier, wholesomer, better insight into their own lives and will send them away inspired with greater courage and higher resolve to face the inevitable tragedy and strain of everyday life.

A Church Theater.

The Rev. Harry E. Robbins, Protestant Episcopal rector of St. James' Church, West Hartford, Connecticut, has leased the Star Theater for a long term. He intends to open a moving picture show, co-operating with the various charitable organizations of the city, his idea being to improve the environment and conditions under which the pictures are generally shown and to improve the standards of business in its general particulars by the elimination of possible objectionable features. On Sunday afternoons prominent speakers will give addresses and in January ex-President William H. Taft has promised to speak on the "Causes of Industrial Unrest and the Remedies Therefor."

The Picture in the Panama Exposition.

One of the chief exhibits in the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco next year will be a moving picture show which will display to the visitors of the exposition the beauties and wonders of the London and Paris of America. Cameramen are now at work picturizing river, harbor and land, and one-half of the city's appropriation of $100,000 is to be expended in erecting and equipping the building which will visualize Manhattan's skyscrapers and traffic and harbor. The auditorium of the theater will seat six hundred persons and on the walls and the drop-curtain are to be painted scenes of New York City in 1715, 1815 and 1915, which are now being executed by J. Burdette Long. By a clever lighting arrangement these mural paintings will appear alternately as daylight, twilight and moonlight views and the building will, in addition, contain a large model of New York City in miniature. The building has been designed by the city architect, Bertram Goodhue, and the cornerstone will be laid early in October. It is to be located on the Avenue of States between the Pennsylvania and New Jersey state buildings and will overlook San Francisco Harbor and the Golden Gate. Among other things it will be the headquarters for the National Association of Mayors who will meet there in congress to discuss the movement for city improvement.

"Go to the Head, Wisconsin."

Schools and colleges have played with the moving picture as a part of their educational paraphernalia for several years, but it has remained for the Department of Visual Instruction of the Extension Division of the University of Wisconsin to work out a practical scheme for really utilizing the picture in its work. It was ascertained last summer that fifteen Wisconsin schools were already equipped with moving picture projection machines and that two hundred and twenty-five schools had stereopticons. What was needed was a cheap, practical method of utilizing these machines and the department has worked out a feasible scheme from which great results are expected. They have already secured over 400,000 slides and nearly 100,000 feet of film, which they have classified and arranged so as to provide a weekly change of program in the different public schools. Each school subscribing will receive a set of pictures or slides each week and the only expense to which they will be put will be the amount of the expressage from the last place of shipment which will average about fifty cents per package. Printed lectures accompany each set so that the persons who are to deliver the lectures will be able to make the most of the exhibitions. The Racine schools, for instance, purpose to use the pictures during January, February and March, showing them to the children of the schools on Friday afternoons and to the parents and other people of the city at the regular social gatherings held on Saturday evenings, the idea being not only to instruct and amuse the children but also to interest the parents and others in the work the children are doing and in the possibilities of the picture as a method of education.

This is decidedly the most important step that has yet been taken towards the serious use of the picture in technical educational work and it deserves the heartiest cooperation and backing of everyone in the business, be he manufacturer, exchange man or exhibitor. On the one hand, the educators have been complaining that they were unable to get the kind of pictures they needed in order to make the pictures of any real value to them in their work, and on the other hand, the manufacturers have been finding fault with the lack of demand for strictly educational pictures. The real fault, however seems to lie with the exchanges, who have simply refused to take any trouble to cater to the educator any more than they do to the ordinary exhibitor. The University of Wisconsin offers as a solution that the state universities become exchanges for the schools of the state and it has proceeded to carry out its proposal in an eminently practical form. Its success or failure really depends on how far the manufacturers will co-operate with the university. While there is comparatively little material that can be used in connection with the regular courses of school instruction, there is a great deal that can be used in connection with the university extension courses, and there is no earthly reason why the manufacturers should not supply the state universities with this just as they supply the regular exchanges with the amusement stuff. It will not hurt the exhibitor in any way and it will benefit the cause of the manufacturer and education.

A Sunday Exhibition.

The Royal Theater in Hartford, Connecticut, has begun a series of Sunday exhibitions for the purpose of raising funds to aid those who are needy and destitute owing to the present war in Europe. The proceeds are turned over to the Helping Hand Benevolent Association who investigate and help each case brought to its notice. The first of these exhibitions was given on Sunday, September 27th. No admission fee was charged, but a collection amounting to $41.25 was taken, which left a balance of $11.25 after deducting the expenses of running the house, renting reels, music and police service. Before the running of the first picture, City Councilman William Raphael stepped on the stage and made a short speech, explaining the object of the exhibition and asking for liberal contributions. The operator then flashed on the screen the following slide: "This is Sunday. Please do not applaud or stamp your feet." The pictures were similar to those shown on week days and there were eight reels, including a three-reel feature. The management of the theater has donated the use of the theater without charge until the end of the war, and it is planned to continue the exhibitions along these lines.

Get in Touch with the National Board.

The Fourth Ward Parent-Teachers' Association of Lake Charles, Louisiana, has begun a movement for the censorship of the local moving picture houses, inasmuch as many of the subjects shown on the screen "are unfit for youthful eyes." Under a state law passed at the last session of the Legislature, municipalities are authorized to establish a board of censorship, the members of which are to serve without pay, or can be recompensed at the discretion of the city authorities. This board may pass on all pictures before they are exhibited and has power to impose fines and imprisonment for violation of its mandates.

This means more legal censorship with all its attendant evils of waste of time and money, temptation to graft and pitifully useless exasperation to everybody concerned. Why not get in touch with the National Board of Censorship and try out the scheme that they have already begun to put in operation and that seems likely to prove the solution of this vexing problem? An outline of the plan will be found in the Moving Picture World of Oct. 17, 1914, volume 22, page 311, and further particulars can be obtained from J. W. Binder, of the National Board, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Who Wants to be Educated?

Please don't everybody speak at once. On the 5th of October we read a paper to the Ed-Au Club on the "Educational Element of a Photoplay," the gist of which was that every photoplay which had a point and a punch and tended to make a man better than he was before he saw it, even if he was down and out and good for nothing, had an educational value and was an educational picture. Among other things we said that we were not advocating doses of castor oil in sarsaparilla or whiskey sandwiches, but pure food candy that was digestible as well as enjoyable, and we stated that every author was responsible for what he put into a script, every editor for what he accepted, every director for what he produced and every reviewer for what he passed. An editor and a director have taken us to task on this last proposition, the director saying that if he did not produce what his boss told him to, even if it were immoral and unadulterated filth, he would lose his job, and the editor saying "Does either the manufacturer or the exhibitor or the public want to be educated?" As to the director we have only to say that he is sadly in need of education. There is not a decent manufacturer in the business who would not be glad to give him another job if he lost his present one because he refused to do dirty work. As to the editor, we think that all three of the persons he mentions are only too glad to be educated. The trouble with him is that he does not understand what education means and that he has missed the point of our paper.

Education means helping a man to make the most of what he is and what he has and to become a better man than he was before. There is not a man on God's earth who does not want that. There is not an exhibitor who does not want to make a success of his business and unless he is an unmitigated ass and a bonehead who is not glad to get a tip on what his patrons really want and what will fill his house. There is no manufacturer who will not cater to his market and do what he can to supply the demand in sight. In other words, every one, manufacturer, exhibitor or spectator, unless he is an unmitigated self-conceited ass, wants a proper value for his money and wants to know that he gets it. At present everybody is dissatisfied because nobody is getting what they want and everybody will welcome anything that will put things on a more satisfactory basis. The solution of the difficulty is the photoplay with a point as well as a punch, the comedy as well as the drama that will give the spectator something to remember, something that he can carry home with him and that will help to make the sordidness of his everyday life more endurable and bearable and will give him visions of the better things in store for the man who keeps on fighting manfully the fight for the ideas that God has vouchsafed him a vision of.

EDUCATIONAL NOTES.

Pathe's news serials must be seen without a break by all who wish to have an intelligent grasp of the European war details, in so far as they can be secured apart from the actual conflicts. The views are becoming so complete that they are a perfect education in all that pertains to nations involved, in a manner positively impossible from the most graphic description from the pen of the most facile writer. The last releases, Nos. 66 and 67, have views of Servian preparations, which gives an insight into the customs of that little-known people. From England views making the beholder familiar with the most potent character in the conflict, Lord Kitchener, are shown, bringing to the public gaze the most modest of the world's greatest heroes. King George, the popular moving picture "Royal actor," is seen in his great activities for the welfare of his soldiers.

It is very interesting to read the "Exhibitors' News," now published in the Moving Picture World. From an educational standpoint they do contain "interesting information concerning moving picture work everywhere." How every state is making preparations for valuable results from the showing of pictures in the Panama-Pacific Exposition is found in the reading of the various items which will enable kinematograph enthusiasts to follow intelligently the progress made by the moving pictures in that exposition. It begins to loom up as a possibility that altogether there may be a moving picture exposition scattered about the great exposition buildings that will be of larger proportions than even in the International Moving Picture Exposition itself. It is of chief interest to the "educator" to notice that the educational idea prevails in all the varied propositions, and that the greatest good, rather than the greatest profit, seems to predominate. In other respects, also, the reading of these "News" notes shows the development of the moving picture among the higher authorities everywhere, the special class of subjects receiving attention by these authorities is also important. There is nothing more clearly giving the standing and progress of the picture business in all its varied phases, than these most interesting notes; the writer testifies to their value personally as a gauge of public opinion and of the true and natural growth of the power of the pictures at large.

MAKING FEATURES IN DETROIT.

J. A. Servis and A. W. Beal, respectively general manager and secretary of the Esperanto Film Manufacturing Co., of Detroit, Mich., were in New York City some days ago arranging for the release of their first big feature production, through one of the important sales agencies in the film industry.

The Esperanto company is an enterprise backed by a number of prominent men of Detroit who seem possessed of a well-defined determination to put the big Michigan city very much on the map as far as the business of manufacturing pictures is concerned. They have already equipped a thoroughly modern studio and factory in Detroit and have had their companies far up into the Canadian wilds for the purpose of securing the "local color" called for in the story of their first feature, the title of which has not yet been definitely decided upon. The Esperanto company is the only feature concern at present making pictures in Detroit.

With their first picture, a four-reeler, ready for release, the Esperanto people are engaged in making a second picture, a two-reeler, which will be vastly different from the first in that it will be a story of city life.

BURSTING OF A BUBBLE.

Recent newspaper interviews with a titled would-be promoter in the moving picture field quote him as saying, "I find that I have lost at least $250,000 through the failure of subscribers to make good their subscriptions for my pictures." Evidently his highness was counting chickens not yet hatched, on the assumption that all money paid into the company as stock subscriptions would be his own good American dollars. We are inclined to congratulate the prospective subscribers in going no further and in deciding to spend their own money. As far as we have been able to learn, this proposed moving picture business venture had about as much chance of a quarter million of profits as some of the other promoting schemes that have lately taken this particular industry as a shining mark for some easy money. Our opinion is that there is mighty little stock of the really worth-while moving picture companies being offered to the public.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Montgomery.

JUST lately we've been watching Montgomery. We do not go to Jacksonville just to watch him, but so long as we happen to be hanging around, we can't help seeing him. When we got there some of Jacksonville was very sorry for Montgomery. His Grand theater was not large enough to hold the crowds that came to see his feature program. He had not had the foresight to build a larger house, and here was a regular theater going up in the self-same block. To hear it you almost felt sorry for him yourself. He was away so you could not weep on his shoulder, but a couple of days later he turned up with a new high grade projection machine and the next day we all knew that he was going to move his features over to the Duval, the sole dramatic house, occupying the place whenever there was no road combination booked. That means he has the largest place in town for about five days a week. The house is just off the main artery, but the day we came away he opened, and still he could not get them in, though his advertising campaign had been limited to about five days.

He turned loose with a modest noise that sounded like a fog siren, and he built up on that. He had the best and highest priced machine and the best and highest-priced subjects in the best theater and it was all for ten cents. He didn't have to wait to build, or did not have to build. When he was ready there was a house for him: a house that was glad to make him welcome. The street in front of his Grand was all torn up, but people walked the plank for a chance to stand in the lobby until they could enter. It is evident that they went up the street to the Duval when he opened that, and yet he still had a crowd about the Grand the opening day of the other house.

Not every manager can write a Montgomery advertisement, for it takes something more than desire to write one of those from-the-heart chats that he uses. Not every manager can show the Montgomery hustle, for he is a rarely experienced showman, but every manager can show the Montgomery spirit.

Staying Nice.

One night, before Montgomery got back from New York, a group of the Lubin players were standing as near the front of the house as they could get. The city was putting down an electrical subway and not only was the sidewalk torn up and the wagon way closed to traffic, but there was a shaft directly in front of the house. "Bet Montgomery kicks when he gets back and sees that," ventured one of the actors. We unavailingly offered to bet that he would say he was glad. When he landed he came out with a neat advertisement in which he regretted that his patrons had suffered discomfort, but he also expressed his pleasure that Jacksonville was taking another huge step forward. Under the circumstances the pleasure more than balanced the pain. It takes the right sort of man to look on a hole in front of his theater as an advertising asset, but Montgomery never missed a trick. Are you merely a manager or are you also a leading citizen? Get next the people, not merely to get them in but to be one of them, to be someone of importance. With some sections of the South reporting business almost dead, Montgomery has kept his business up to standing room through the hot Florida summer. We did not get this information from him but from the people who have been around the house night after night. He did it by building up his show instead of cutting it down, building in quality rather than quantity. He doesn't wilt; he fights, and fighting, he goes to fresh conquests, and these conquests are not without their financial triumphs.

Buzzers.

Evidently the Orpheum at Gardner is not the only live house on the Trimount Theater Company's list. J. M. Livingston, of the Academy of Music, Lowell, sends in the first issue of the Buzz and wants to know if we think that he defeats his aim by giving the sheet the suggestion of a general publication. Since he adds that 789 copies were distributed the first day, of which but 45 were found in the house at the end of the performance, we think he knows the answer. The Buzz is not going to deceive anyone into the belief that it is a purely literary weekly, but on the other hand it does give enough general reading to make people want to take it home and show it to the rest of the family. They have faked Question Box that is going to be a headliner if they can keep it up. This is a sample of the replies:

> Dear Miss Fromage:
> Can you tell me of some original dish to serve at a sewing circle luncheon. Ciprienetta Pytty.
> Why not serve watermelon cream puffs. These are made by painting the outside of the puffs with light and dark stripes of greenhouse paint. Color the cream inside a bright red with the celebrated cut-glass dyes. Now insert a few shoe buttons to represent the seeds, and there you are.

If it costs you eight general items to get three house puffs read, it is a good bargain, and so far the patron as well as the house is paid by the Buzz. The editor sets himself a hot pace, but Mr. Livingston writes that he is "a newspaper man by profession and a theatrical manager by inclination," and we think he can go the route. Too many programs are spoiled by being too strictly advertising. They are not read. The trick is to shunt them from a joke to an advertisement, restore confidence with a couple of readers and sting them again. Perhaps Mr. Livingston can spare a couple of programs if you send a stamped and addressed envelope for them. One clever line refers to the house as "The Gee-Whiz show with the Goodness Gracious prices." Harry de Subers doesn't do any better than that.

Chaney's Gone.

We thought it about time for N. E. Chaney to be doing something, but we didn't expect him to get married. That's what he went and did. It happened August 22, in Cleveland, but was not announced until September 4th. Mrs. Chaney was Miss Elsie Hall. Here's our congratulations and the congratulations of all the others he has helped with his ad suggestions.

What Does He Mean?

B. A. Mulligan, of the Isis theater, Pensacola, Fla., one of the Fichtenberg enterprises, sends in a picture of an advertisement on a soda fountain mirror. Probably the word "special" under the Trey o' Hearts will not come out clearly, being done in a color that takes too dark, but that is the meat of the idea, that you can buy the Trey o' Hearts Special for ten cents. The letter explains all but one point:

> Enclosed you will find photo showing how we "boosted" "The Trey o' Hearts." You will notice that the publicity stunt on the mirror was secured without any expense. The advertising that was given to this feature from this source was immense as everybody in town saw the "AD" and the soda man derived the profits from the special drink.
> I am sending you this idea so that you may pass the word around and let the Brother Exhibitors get in on this idea as every town has plenty of fine mirrors that may be secured for the asking and a few free tickets.
> Of course the work must be executed in first class style, otherwise the display has no advertising value, and it may be necessary to call into service the local sign man who can turn this water color work out for you at very little expense. I execute all my displays and the soda boys are always glad to see me come around as I not only make business good for them while I am painting the mirrors but the mouth to mouth advertising secured in places the size of this town is very great.
> We have a very strong program. In fact, I have never heard of one any better; thus:
> Universal Films, first run.
> General Film Company's features, four three-reel features a week and all of their big specials.
> Paramount program, two a week, Tuesdays and Fridays.
> Our daily program ordinarily consists of five reels.

But what does that "mouth to mouth" line mean? Next he'll be telling that they drink in every word and that it is an orange and not a lemon.

The scheme is good if you can letter nicely and is good still when you can hire a man to do the job at a reasonable price. The water color washes off without hurting the glass, and few soda fountains will object. The number of people who drop in for a drink just to see what is being done will bring the proprietor a profit since it is a good "ballyhoo" for him.

They are working in with the Pensacola News in publishing the story of "The Trey o' Hearts," the paper giving them a full page installment of the first chapter with joint advertising on the back for general distribution.

Advertising Film.

The Montgomery theater, Atlanta, is running an advertising film for a local piano house. We thought the practice was dying down and we are sorry to see it revived. If the piano people want to show the film, they should run it in their store as the National Cash Register people do. Another two-reel subject is virtually an advertising subject since it is promulgated by an association of bankers and preaches the beauty of a savings bank account. There is a difference between a propaganda story and an advertisement.

Haynic on Apples.

This essay on apples is from the D. K. special of the Haynic theater, Fairmount, Minn. It's good matter for almost any section, possibly with a change of fruit.

A LITTLE TALK ON APPLES.

There is an awful difference in apples. About this time of the year the market is flooded with cheap apples, but they are mostly what is known as "wind-falls." A little later we get a chance to pay a lot more money for apples, but we get the sound, HAND-PICKED kind for the money.

There is a lot of similarity between apples and moving pictures. You can buy pictures for a lot less money than we choose to pay, but what you get is very much in the nature of "wind-falls." You get the average run of the company you are dealing with, the good with the poor, and you have to take what they tie up and hand to you. We don't buy that kind. Our pictures are of the HAND-PICKED variety. We select our own programs from the output of a large number of prominent producers, we select them with care, rejecting all those that are spotted, blighted or otherwise not up to grade, with the result that we are able at all times to offer our patrons the best and most interesting programs obtainable.

Likes It.

Lately we suggested to Manager Kear, of the Minersville Opera House, that his red and green ink program was a little too noisy. He writes that he has made the change and encloses an all-green program that looks vastly better. He was making an appeal to the better class of patronage with the big features and the last issue of his program will please them better.

Three Beats One.

This is self explanatory. Three free installments is a lot, but usually a lot brings a lot.

Having noticed in a recent issue of the World where you complimented our brother exhibitor, Fichtenberg of New Orleans, on his new method of interesting people in serial pictures by giving a free performance of the first episode, I think it justifiable that I should tell you of the plan inaugurated by our theater. We not only gave one free show for the first episode of "The Adventures of Kathlyn," but billed the town all over with heralds for the first three episodes, which were shown to 1,400 people free of charge. And we got them interested. On Friday nights, when we run "Kathlyn" nothing in the world could hold the people away. On one night it poured down rain throughout the entirety of the run, and the house was packed just seats 1,400.

As advertising manager for the Airdome I want to state that the Moving Picture World is the greatest asset to my success. It would break me up to have to miss an issue, and if you will send one of your representatives to take a look at my file you will find just exactly 192 issues. They date back to 1910, and are kept in order. I often have use for the back numbers, and had an awful chase recently after a negro, who stole a copy.

In advertising "Trey o' Hearts" we took this town by storm. Went out one night about twelve o'clock and stuck an advertising heart under every door in the city, business houses included. And the serial is running the best in the world.

I fear that I am taking up too much of your valuable time, but I wanted to let you know something about the show house that gives more for a man's money than any other theater in Texas. We run six reels every night, three Universal and three Mutual. All new stuff, too, and coupled with it we have music from a four-piece Spanish orchestra. NO COMPETITION. Isn't that going some?

It is going some to give a good show with no competition, but some day when there is competition, past record will count strong in favor of the old establishment.

Another Claimant.

Edward F. Breeze, of the Princess, Flemingsburg, Ky., declares in on the Quo Vadis controversy. With a seating capacity of 225, a population of 1,200, showing only to whites, they hung out the S. R. O. at ten and twenty-five cents. Who's next?

Wants to Know.

James C. Quinn, of Los Angeles, wants to know:

HOW MANY

"Finest theaters in the city,"
(the same in America)
"Largest pipe organs,"
"Best orchestras in the world,"
"Coolest spots in town,"
"World's greatest film productions,"
"World's greatest bargain matinees,"
"Biggest and best shows for the money,"
"Longest shows in the city,"
"Greatest picture ever produced,"

and a hundred and one et ceteras, ending with how many theater owners are not alive to the fact that the public is advancing faster in the picture business than about 75 per cent of themselves, that the same long-suffering public shies at the above examples of "hokum" and others of similar nature, and that the falling off in attendance is due largely to too much "Barnum" and too little "business." The way the motion picture has stood up under the torture that has been inflicted upon it makes the German army look like a bunch of china dolls. And the carnage still goes merrily on.

This is humor with a stinger to it, for the public is tired of "hokum" and tired, sometimes very tired, of being taken for dunces. Think it over.

"My Show."

That's the name of a house in Rochester, Ind., run by W. S. Bassett. It is a change from Princess and Bijous and Pictos, Idle Hours and the rest. Mr. Bassett writes that the town has a population of about 5,000, two picture shows and two daily papers, one with a circulation of five or six hundred. He wants to know whether we think that it would pay better to advertise in that paper at three cents a line or get out his own house organ. The rate is small, working out at 42 cents an inch. It would cost $15 to $20 a week to reach such part of 600 readers as might be interested in pictures. It will be easy for him to find out how much it will cost for a thousand programs, and how much of that cost he can, with safety, lay off on outside advertisements. Then the only question that remains is how good a paper he can get out. He sends some one-sheet slips, merely giving a condensed synopsis of the releases on the program for the week. There is no house matter and no general stuff. If Mr. Bassett can get a good rate from the printer and can make his sheet really interesting, he would do well to have his own paper in preference to a five-inch advertisement, but it must be something that will be taken into the home and read for its worth. If he can do that, he wins, but he gives us nothing on which to base an opinion on this point.

He sends in a D. K. in the shape of a blue tag bordered with dollar marks and reading:

Quality first—see the Million Dollar Mystery
At My Show.
The Place your dime does its duty
Every Friday Night.

The wording is good, but we would suggest putting brackets on the "dime" line. It is to be supposed that the dime does its duty any night in the week. In the arrangement the line Every Friday Night stands out so boldly that it is not coupled with the preceding line but with the title of the subject, but it is just as easy to be exact. Using the colored card he gets better results than he would with a straight manila tag.

Regal Productions.

"Regal productions" is what Emil Kerhlein, Jr., styles his features at the Kinema, Fresno, California. A splendidly printed cover in color and gold holds a four-page white insert announcing the turning to features. To start them off properly, this announcement is made:

NOTE.—Ladies will be admitted FREE to every one of the above matinees, providing they show the doorkeeper on entering the Kinema theater that they have retained this booklet. Show the booklet on these four days and ladies will be admitted FREE.

This refers to a series of four matinees, the first on September 28th and the last December 24th. This means that a majority of these booklets, covering many other notable productions, will be held about three months at the cost of admission to four matinee performances. It is an adroit scheme and quite in line with the old Kerhlein work. This is the first time Mr. Kerhlein has been in the department for some time. Now that he is back, we hope that he stays in.

Loosen Up.

George A. Bleich, of the Empress and Princess, Owensboro, Ky., sends in some of his newspaper advertising and says that with the exception of the Universal, the manufacturers are lax in producing material for advertising, such as mats and electros. You have to hand it to Joe Brandt, but Vitagraph and Edison are helpful as are a few of the others. When a manager is willing to spend money to popularize a brand, it should be up to the brand to give all the assistance possible.

Evidently Mr. Bleich likes serials, for one advertisement reads:

Starts Monday, July 13th
The day that the Kathleen Series ends
The Million Dollar Mystery.

He is taking no chances on a drop in the interest very evidently. He seems to have dropped the "personal" style of advertising in which he was running a good second to Montgomery, for he apologizes the one time he makes use of that form. The advertisements are well set, but we think it would pay Mr. Bleich to go back to the earlier style. It is a business maker when done intelligently—and that was his way. He sizes up his situation nicely in these paragraphs:

The press is in my estimation by far the best medium to reach the public, especially in the smaller cities. I have tried nearly every method.

It must be borne in mind that our rates permit a more or less generous use of space, but even if I were in a city, except the very largest, it would be the papers for mine.

The press, as a rule, is very glad to print items pertaining to films of note, and these readers always are good advertisements. The trouble is that so few exhibitors know how to prepare copy along this line and they are inclined to inflict long drawn out film stories and synopses instead of crisp short items.

One snappy paragraph is worth a half column of tiresome puffery. It is not how much you get but what good it will do that counts. That's a lesson that even some professional press agents learn slowly.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

At the Inquest Club.

MARC EDMUND JONES and Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice were the stars of the third Inquest at Keene's Chop House Oct. 19. Mr. Jones is mentioned first merely because he did most of the talking since his "American Daylight" was the leading subject at the Savoy, and this happy chance gave the jurymen opportunity to question the author and draw some important conclusions. Mr. Jones explained that this was one of a series of "light" stories he has written for American, others being Moonlight, Firelight, Twilight, and others with a suggestion by mail from E. W. Matlack that he had overlooked prest-o-lite and a comment from the coroner that Edison was producing electric light. But Jones explained that each title in a way suggested the story, showing the effect of that particular light, but admitted that in production much of the psychology of the stories had been lost, which pointed out the fact that too much character drawing and psychology cannot be gotten over—at least at present. Another interesting point was a question as to why one of the characters was dropped off a cliff, and this developed the fact that in the original script the character was in love with the heroine and she with him and that she blamed the hero for his death until blindness brought the pity that led to love. All of this was germane to the story, but, all the death having been eliminated, the incident became intrusive. It was further suggested that authors should mark certain actions, even though the directors should be supposed to know. In this story the hero is stricken blind. He did not, as blind persons do, turn to those persons speaking to him, but looked away to emphasize his blindness at the cost of naturalness.

The clumsy technical construction of an Imp brought forth some comment, but the Mutual Girl merely added another fifty feet of story to several hundred feet of dressmaking, which was more interesting to audiences than to authors.

Miss Justice was received with applause and made a graceful speech. George Hennessy was in the jury for the first time this season, as was Mrs. Laurie Mackin and Mr. Jacobi. Fred Mace and P. C. Hartigan had promised to be present but did not show up. There was a large jury box, and for the first time since the summer recess the side tables were called into play. John William Kellette, Associate Coroner, assisted in presiding, but would not take the gavel.

The next Inquest will be held Nov. 2 (election eve), the jury meeting at the Savoy theater as usual.

With All Good Wishes.

Cards announce the marriage of Elizabeth Van der Veer Breuil to Gerrit Willem van Limburgh in New York City Oct. 8. Perhaps you have already recognized Mrs. Beta Breuil in the above, but Beta Breuil will now be a pen name only, retained for professional purposes.

Sticking to It.

The other day Edward W. Matlack, Pittsburgh Coroner and virtually staff writer for the Kalem company, breezed into town. Reaching into our 1912 file he located his first contribution to this department. This is what he found:

> To date I have written seven photoplays, never sending them to more than two companies, as two rejections make it appear that the effort has fallen short of requirements. It was rather difficult to read the signs at first, as rejection slips did not offer any suggestions as to what was wrong, but the last crop were a little different, one editor being kind enough to write a page of advice. The other rejections were due, I think, to the fact that the scripts were not quite within their line. I figure that if one can, within the year, produce anything that is worth considering, the case is not absolutely hopeless.

That's much the same style of letter that still comes in. It will be noticed that Mr. Matlack recorded no sale, but was cheered by a page of criticism. Two years later he was selling two to four reels a week and ranging from comedy to straight drama. He did not get discouraged, he kept on plugging. Last night he thought out an idea. This morning he borrowed one of the Kalem machines and had the story typed and sold by noon. What has been done can be done.

Why Not?

Two letters—and both from California—recently take this department to task for servile worship of editors, and just because we advise writers to let their scripts lie if they want to sell them. One genius who has written eighty scripts and sold none goes further and outlines the message he will send any company that dares offer him fifteen dollars for a script.

Now we are not lost in admiration of the methods of some editors and we have no desire to hand them bouquets. Moreover the business office of this paper does not require this writer to "truckle" to editors and it is solely for the good of the submitting authors in particular and the market in general that the advice to let scripts lie until they are passed upon is given. The advice is based on the sound rules of buyer and seller, and it is not within the province of this paper or any other agency to change the established methods, and so all that remains to be done is to abide by the rules of the buyer or stop seeking to sell.

At the present moment the Daily Consular Reports are filled with letters from South American consuls and consular agents explaining how the American manufacturer may go about getting business from the Latin-Americas. In almost every instance the emphasis is laid on the necessity for longer credit. England and Germany have had the markets. They have given credits of 60, 90 or even 120 days, where the American manufacturer wants to collect cash against documents, and the consular writers, without exception, are emphatic in stating that these credits must be extended by the manufacturers of this country if they would do business. The Latins are the buyers. They buy as they please. The seller must abide their rules or fail to sell.

It is precisely the same way in photoplay. If you know that a company will not pass on a script within six weeks and you want an immediate reply, do not send to that company, knowing perfectly well you will not get a prompt answer. The buyer makes the rules. It is for the seller to comply with those rules if he wishes to do business. If he does not like the rules, there is nothing to compel him to submit scripts. We cannot understand where the novice gets the idea that he is able to rise superior to all rules. The men and women who sell make little or no complaint. They play the rules and make their sales. The boob kicks and makes no sales because he does kick.

War News.

It would seem that the market for photoplays has shrunk slightly since the war, but in some quarters there is already noted a feeling of returning confidence and it should not be long before the market returns to normal. The war has had practically small effect on the real photoplay houses in this country and the steady increase in the output of foreign-made films had already reduced the European sale of American-made film. There is no particular reason why the market should drop at all and it is to be expected that the manufacturers will realize this presently and recover from the scare that has affected most lines of business.

Writing Action.

T. W. Relman writes that he is a little at a loss about writing action as twice he has had stories returned as being written too fully and twice comment has been made that action is too brief. Sinning at both ends, he wonders if there is any safe middle course.

There is only one rule that will be safe and that is to write as briefly as possible, but to write all of the essential action in such a manner that it gets over to the director and through him to the audience. There can be no hard and fast rule of so many lines to a scene or a foot. Some scenes of small footage may require several lines of explanation. A long scene may be dismissed with a single line, if that single line is fully explanatory. The author's own good sense is the judge. In this connection we quote from Phillips' The Photodrama:

> The editor, the director and the actor must understand from your scenario exactly what action, interpretation and suggestion your words are intended to convey. "Beyond words," "inexpressible" and "indescribable" are confessions of weakness that disappoint editors and bring manuscripts back by return mail.

Cultivate in combination the art of expression and the art of condensation and you will eventually arrive at the happy medium of exactness of phrase with brevity.

And in the last analysis it all means merely this: Practice writing scenes—just scenes alone. Write a scene in two hundred words. Now keep at that scene until you can get it down to fifty words, to twenty-five, to ten even, and still retain every essential contained in those two hundred words. When you learn how to write compact single scenes, you will experience no difficulty in writing a compact and comprehensive play.

Books on Technique.

One of the best technical books for the student of photoplay is a good dictionary. This can be backed up by a Thesarus, a grammar and a rhetoric. This is not the sort of "technique" that most writers seem to think necessary, but they are what are often more sadly needed than any treatise on photoplay construction, since an ability to write and spell good, common English is the first requirement. The more complete your education, the better the chance you stand.

Classified Clips.

Arthur F. Stilson offers a good suggestion in scrap book making. He classifies his clippings, assigning them to such heads as "Comedy," "Drama," "Leaders," "Inserts," "Cut-ins" and the other little points. If he has any trouble, instead of looking through a mass of material, he turns to the proper division and finds, ready to his hand, all of the matter relating to that particular point. He uses a straight composition book, but we think any loose leaf system would be better and more elastic.

Most of these books are so cheap that they may be purchased, but at a pinch take two strips of wood five-eighths of an inch wide and a quarter of an inch thick. Insert three common bolts at equal distances, using either the straight or the winged nuts. Get a two or three-inch bolt and you'll have a binder that will hold a library of scraps, using any cheap but tough paper for the pages.

Rejection Reasons.

Four letters in the last few weeks raise a wail because many editors have recalled their rejection slips. The writers argue that it would take but a moment to check the slip and that the editor should be a good fellow.

This is all wrong. The editor is there to buy scripts. If you can write the stuff he wants he will buy it. If you can't it is up to you to find out how. It is not his business to teach you. It will take but a moment to check a slip, but it is not merely a matter of checking a slip. The check cannot be made until the script is carefully read and there is no sense in carefully reading an unavailable script. Most editors discontinued the practice because it seemed to do more harm than good. You have no claim on the editor. It is foolish to try to establish one. In the early days editors had to educate writers in self-defense. Now they can get good scrips from someone if not from you. It is none of their fault that you are sending out before you are competent to write. Just as a matter of fact, many editors do give real help, but they now give it only where the writer seems to be of sufficient promise to make it worth while.

Synopsis.

Here is a letter from one of the big editors to an author who thinks he knows better than the editors what they want. It runs:

> We require a comprehensive synopsis (not exceeding three hundred words per reel) which covers the plot of the scenario. In reading hundreds of manuscripts, a vague paraphrase is of no assistance in determining availability for our various producers, casts, locations, etc.

And this is the way the offending synopsis started off:

> He was his own worst enemy, until the revelation came. Then, when the hand of adversity bore down upon him relentlessly, he turned to her, whom he had scorned. They started life anew and into the life of each, etc., etc.

The editor adds in comment:

> When will they wake up to the fact that scenario writing is a business proposition? That the scenario they are going to sell is the one that somebody wants to buy!
> The real writer doesn't kick at the editor's insistence upon a comprehensive synopsis. He is not afraid that the editor will not read through the entire scenario. He knows that when the busy editor has his fingers crossed, looking for a modern society drama in the mail, he is able to set aside the Indian and comedy subjects (proclaimed by their synopses) until such time as he can look them over carefully to determine their availability for the Indian and comedy companies.

And the worst of it is that the dizzy synopsis comes from a man who should know better. He knows that the synopsis is what sells his script, and he knows that the editor wants a motion picture, not a word picture, but he smears a page of previously good paper with what he fondly imagines to be literature and then wonders at a lack of sales.

A true synopsis should bear the same relationship to the photoplay action that a landscape seen through the large end of a field glass bears to the same landscape properly viewed. It is the same thing, but reduced. If the glasses show a tree, a house, a well curb, the proper view will perhaps show the panes of glass in the windows, the branches of the tree, the boards of the well curb and all the little details. Reverse the glasses and we see all of the essentials but not the details. It is the same with the synopsis. It should give the main points but not the details that are unessential. It should tell of the well curb without seeking to explain whether the curb is built of pine or hickory, or whether it is painted red or green. The editor wants to know about the curb, but not about the details of the curb.

This does not mean that the synopsis must be a dry recital of facts, for the facts can be stated interestingly as well as briefly, but the synopsis is no place for florid flights of fancy and the use of such ub as this does not indicate the possession of the literary quality but the almost total lack of common sense. Any time that the editor wants to read literature he can buy a better book than you can write, and get more of it. Do not try to supply him with literature—write him a synopsis.

Moving Day.

Edwin Ray Coffin, who used to have to ride forty miles to see a photoplay, and who, none the less, sold a lot, has quit the ranch and is motoring back to Iowa where he will make his home.

That Checked Slip.

Here is an excerpt from a recent note that bears on the value of that checked slip:

> I sent a two-reel Western drama to ———. It was returned with a slip stating "Excellent—but one reel." (Lack of experience as to length on my part.) I sent in the script again to ask if I should reconstruct and was told: "Situations no novelty."

Of what value is such "criticism" as this that contradicts itself?

True Stuff.

Three happenings lately emphasized the impossibility of the true story as a theme. The first was the news of a tragedy that had happened to a friend. It would make a most impressive story—but it lies too close to home. Recently E. W. Matlack told of the thrilling things that had happened to him while working on a train wire. "I could not write them, of course," he added matter-of-factly. The third was a synopsis from a newcomer. It had happened to him. It was the dry history of the happening, devoid of charm. The facts were put on paper. The charm lay in the mind of the author.

Learn to invent plots. Do not try to work with material that has happen to you or to a friend of yours. You will defeat your aim every time.

If This Keeps Up.

A recent letter from Julian Louis Lamothe advises: "Three years ago today I received my first check. Today I received three acceptances." Mark Edmund Jones remembered that last year, on the second anniversary, Mr. Lamothe received two acceptances. At that rate of progression, about 1934 the man from New Orleans should be getting a lot of money on his anniversaries. Mr. Lamothe's object in writing was to speak a good word for mutual criticism in opposition to Mr. Courtney. He has five or six friends read his scripts, each for some special point. He seems to have profited by the plan, but we personally think it is better to do the work alone, even while we agree with Mr. Lamothe's opening premise:

> It is my firm conviction that few writers are accurate judges of their own work. I'll even go so far as to say that few can detect genuine plots with any marked degree of regularity. Our friends, the editors, prove that. So, knowing my own shortcomings in this respect, it has been a tremendous help to me to get unbiased opinions from my critics. To illustrate—I wrote a two-reel story one which I considered my masterpiece until the criticisms came in. The unanimous verdict was that it was the poorest story that had ever come from my typewriter. Of course, I was disappointed. The script had cost me many hours of good, hard work, but I knew that my critics had not condemned it for the mere sake of condemning. I read their remarks many times, and now I agree with them. The result is another little white form in my morgue.

Getting Work Out.

The secret of doing work is to do it. Do not sit around and think about doing it, but sit down and do it and keep on doing it until it is done, and then, if there is something else to be done, do that. If you come to your desk and oil the machine and put in a new ribbon, sharpen your pencil, empty the waste basket, get a drink of water and look out of the window to see if it is going to rain, you'll find it is time to go to bed before you have even commenced work.

Make it a practise to attend to your machine after your work is done. Before you cover it up for the night dust it off, clean the type, oil it or give it any other attention it may need. Sharpen your pencils, if you use pencils, empty the waste basket and clean up generally. In the morning you come to your desk fresh and rested and you do not fritter away your best hour with office boy tasks. After a time you get into the swing and can do work in a workmanlike fashion.

If you can give only your evenings to your photoplay work, do not eat too much dinner. A full stomach and a full brain seldom go together. Eat something to satisfy your appetite, but do not gorge yourself. Instead set aside a couple of sandwiches or something for a late lunch and merely take the edge off your appetite.

If you are able to work when you will, find out when you do your best work. Many writers work best in the morning, some prefer the afternoon and we know one man who works between midnight and six in the morning. Do your most important work in your best hours and keep the rest of the time for routine.

Be Direct.

If you were going to Smithville and you came to a cross-roads where one road was marked for your destination and the other "To Jonesboro," would you go down the Jonesboro road a half mile and cut across the fields? And yet you may develop your story along some blind lead and drop it for another path, leaving the audience wondering whatever became of the character or the situation introduced. One of the best little ways to leave the spectator disappointed is to suggest that you are going to Jonesboro and then cut across the fields to Smithville, after all. Know where you are going and go there by the most direct route. Do not send people out wondering what became of that little girl or what it meant when that big fellow threatened the hero.

Inquiries.

T. H. S.—Do not send scripts to companies merely because you see their advertisement. Feature companies have no editors and, therefore, no one particularly charged with looking after unsolicited scripts. Both companies are extant, but the mere fact that you insist on sending them scripts does not require them to hire an editor.

E. R. W.—No street address. The copyright may have been reissued. Possibly the Copyright Office will tell you. Better be certain. Better still, leave adaptations alone.

J. F. C., Jr.—"New Orleans" is rather vague as an address for C.O.D. packages. There is no such volume as you ask for because there is not sufficient demand. Each studio has its own ideas as to make ups. Get Talbot's book for camera work. Any bookseller.

Mrs. E. R. F.—Little Jim, in the Sea Dog, was played by Thelma Slater Thompson. It was released in two parts May 21, 1913.

Subscriber.—Your question is too vague. Motion pictures were first introduced commercially about 1895, but "pictures for commercial use" means something quite different.

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter, which should be addressed to this department. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will full manuscripts or synopses be criticized, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department one dollar.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 57.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers looking for high-class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Tell us why rubber-covered wire is rated so very much lower than weatherproof, and, incidentally, explain to us what "rubber-covered" and "weatherproof" insulation consists of, and where each may be used, and why they may be used there. Would it be admissible or desirable to use rubber-covered wire where weatherproof is allowed? How is the strength or quality of insulation determined?

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 51 brought out a bunch of rather queer answers tending to show that the great mass of operators have an exceedingly hazy idea on questions of this kind.

Those entitled to be on the Roll of Honor are: L. C. LaGrow, Albany, New York; John Griffiths, Ansonia, Connecticut; Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington; J. J. Roberts, Nashville, Tennessee; C. A. Webster, Cartersville, Missouri; M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas; Charles B. Stear, Vancouver, British Columbia; William L. Smith, Orange, New Jersey, and Montreal, Canada.

There is one answer, however, that is almost unique in its excellence; so much so that it overtops all the others, and, while it, incidentally, answers several other questions, or portions of them, still I am quoting it in full, because I have never yet seen such a concise and thoroughly-excellent piece of information on this particular subject put into print. This reply is by friend Smith.

Reply to Question No. 51.

By William L. Smith, Orange, N. J.

The Question:

Suppose your manager comes to you and says: "John, the house feed wires are coming in at the rear of our new theater. Now, for certain reasons I want to tap the operating room feeders off at the stage switchboard, carry them up over the auditorium ceiling and down to the operating room board. The distance will be 165 feet. What size wire ought it to be?" What reply would you make? and show us how you would figure it, both for two-wire and three-wire feeders. Suppose he asked the same question concerning feeds supplying current for incandescent circuits carrying a total consumption of 5,000 watts, voltage 110? Look out, now, gentlemen. Voltage drop is what I am after! Tell us how you figure it.

The Answer:

For interior wiring work insulated, tinned copper is the material used as a conductor. Naturally every conductor offers some resistance to the passage of current, and this resistance varies directly as the length of the conductor, and inversely as its cross-sectional area. Therefore, if the length of the conductor be known, and its cross-sectional aera, as well as the conductivity of the material, its resistance may be readily determined. For copper the resistance is expressed in the following formula:

$$\text{Formula No. 1.} \quad R = \frac{11L}{A}$$

Where R is the resistance in ohms; L, the total length of the conductor, expressed in feet; A, the cross-sectional area in circular mills, and 11 a constant equal to the resistance of a circular mill linear foot of commercial copper. The resistance of a circular mill foot of copper, that is a wire one foot long and having an area of one circular mill, is usually taken as 10.8 ohms, but for all commercial purposes 11 ohms will answer. In interior wiring it is useless to exercise such refinement in the value of the resistance of a circular mill foot of copper, especially when the purity of the copper is unknown; when the distances are ordinarily not measured to within many per cent. of accuracy, and when many other factors tending to cause variation enter into calculations. It is also a question whether the use of a circular mill table having values with an average exactness of one hundredth of one per cent. is not an unnecessary refinement in average wiring calculations. Fair results are obtained, for instance, by considering the cross section of a No. 10 wire as equal to 10,000 circular mills, the area of the wire being doubled for each third size larger, and each size having cross-section equal to eight-tenths of that of the next larger wire.

[This works out fairly well, but by third size it is meant to count three, not counting the one being compared, as: A No. 3 wire has an area of 52441 c. m., then counting 2, 1, 0 we find the last named to have 105625 c. m. area, and 52441×2=104882 c. m., as against 105625 in the No. 0. On the other hand 8/10 of the area of a No. 0 wire is 105625÷10=10562.5×8=84500.0 c. m., as against 83,521 for a No. 1. Of course, this sort of rule of thumb work cannot be recommended, but it would serve at a pinch, and serve fairly well, too.—Ed]

By this means calculations may be made without reference to books or tables, and results will be accurate for all ordinary work. The effect of resistance is to cause a drop of voltage in the supply circuit, and the energy lost in overcoming this resistance appears in the form of heat. By the use of Equation No. 2: $e = IR$, in which e is the voltage drop, I the current in amperes and R the resistance of the current, in ohms, the drop in any current may be readily obtained. Thus, if there be a current (I) of 100 amperes in a circuit whose resistance (R) is 0.02 ohm, the drop (e) is equal to 2 volts. By substituting in equation No. 1 the value of R in equation No. 2, the following very useful formulas are obtained. For convenience L is made equal to 2L, so that the distance one way only need be considered, and the contants, 2 and 11 are combined. A is area in c. m.

$$\text{Formula No. 3.} \quad e = \frac{22IL}{A} \text{ in volts}$$

$$\text{Formula No. 4.} \quad A = \frac{22IL}{e} \text{ in circular mills}$$

$$\text{Formula No. 5.} \quad I = \frac{eA}{22L} \text{ in amperes}$$

$$\text{Formula No. 6.} \quad L = \frac{eA}{22I} \text{ in feet}$$

When it is required to have a working formula for N lamps, each of which require i amperes, the following will answer:

$$\text{Formula No. 7.} \quad A = \frac{22NiL}{e} \text{ size in circular mills.}$$

When the drop is expressed as a percentage (p) the size of the wire may be determined by the following:

$$\text{Formula No. 8.} \quad A = \frac{2200LI}{pE} \text{ size in circular mills.}$$

E being the voltage of circuit.

Where, as is often done, the power, P, in watts is given, instead of the amperes, formula No. 9 is used.

$$\text{Formula No. 9.} \quad A = \frac{2200PL}{pE^2} \text{ in circular mills.}$$

If it is desired to find the number of lamps which a given size of wire will feed with a given drop, formula 10 may be used.

$$\text{Formula No. 10.} \quad N = \frac{Ae}{22Li}$$

Three-wire circuits are calculated as two-wire circuits, the over-all voltage and drop as well as total loads being considered.

The question of permissible drop in a circuit should not be slighted in wiring calculations. It is well known that in overcoming resistance electrical energy is wasted, and, as it costs money to develop or buy electrical energy, it is evident that in any commercial system such waste must be kept down to a minimum. This may be done by decreasing the resistance of the conductors, or, what amounts to the same thing, increasing the size of the conductors. Inasmuch as this is also an expensive matter, care must be exercised that the additional sum added to the expenditure in copper is not so excessive as to more than counterbalance the cost of energy saved. It has been laid down as a general rule that for the transmission of any given energy the most economical condition is one having resistance of such value that the value of the energy annually wasted in heat will be equal to the interest per annum on the original cost of the conductor. Knowing the average amount of energy to be transmitted, it becomes an easy matter to figure the average k. w. hours wasted in a conductor of a given resistance. The question of drop increases in importance as the price of energy increases, and decreases as the price of energy decreases, so that where the energy cost may be purchased at a low figure, the loss may be more than offset by the additional cost of copper necessary to avoid it. With regard to the conductors themselves: in interior wiring, it is merely a question of the additional cost of the copper, as the price of installation etc., is usually the same. And now for the examples given in the question

A two-wire operating room feeder supplies a circuit of, say 50 amperes, at a distance of 200 feet from the stage switchboard; the drop allowed is 5 per cent.; the voltage 110. What size wire should be used. By the use of formula No. 8 the size of wire is found to be:

$$A=\frac{2200\times50\times200}{110\times5}=40{,}000 \text{ circular mills,}$$

or a No. 4 wire. If this energy were used ten hours a day for 300 days, and the cost of the energy were 8 cents per k. w. hours, the total yearly cost would be:

$$\frac{50\cdot110\cdot300\cdot0.08}{1{,}000}=$1{,}320.$$

Of this, 5 per cent., or $66.00, would be lost yearly, due to the drop. The cost of 400 feet of No. 4 wire would be about $21.00, so that the loss would be more than three times the cost of the wire, and, without any calculations it is easily seen that wire of that size is not economical for that service.

If, now, a 250,000 circular mill cable be used as a feeder, the drop, according to formula 3, would be:

$$e=\frac{22\times50\times200}{250{,}000}=0.44 \text{ volt.}$$

This is 0.4 per cent loss, and 0.4 per cent. loss on $1,320 is $5.28. The cost of 400 feet of 250,000 circular mill cable is approximately $93.00 and the interest on this amount at 5 per cent. is $4.65 yearly. According to the law given, it would, therefore, be more profitable to install a 250,000 circular mill feeder. A larger size cable than this would not be profitable, with conditions as stated, and a smaller size of wire would be unprofitable. If the conditions of the problem remained the same, except that price of electricity was 4 cents per k. w. hour, instead of 8 cents, the use of a 250,000 circular mill cable would no longer be economical, since the loss would then be only $2.64 per year, while the interest on the copper investment would be $4.65. Less investment in copper would be necessary.

A lamp circuit 165 feet in length, carrying 5,000 watts at 110 volts, would be the same as a circuit having 100 fifty-watt lamps, the drop to be not over 2 per cent.

$$\text{Current } I=\frac{100\times50}{110}=45.4 \text{ amperes}$$ and the drop e=.02×110=2.2 volts.

Applying formula No. 8, the size of the wire would be:

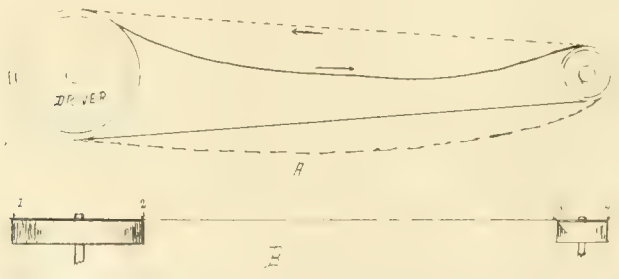
$$A=\frac{2200\times45.4\times165}{110\times2}=80{,}850 \text{ circular mills,}$$

or a No. 1 wire, which is nearest to size given.

[Here is some exceedingly important data, placed before us in effective and intelligent form. The figures are correct and I, for one, am willing to admit that I had never figured out the loss in voltage drop for house circuits in actual dollars and cents. According to this, there are many theaters in which small wires are causing heavy loss. Get busy and figure out your own circuits.—Ed.]

Some Belt Dope.

Many isolated theater plants have belt-driven dynamos, and a number of exhibitors and operators have, at various times, asked for data concerning belt drives, particularly what size belt is necessary for a given horse power.



In the first place, there is a right way and a wrong way to run a belt, the same being shown in the illustration, at A, in which the solid lines represent the right way and the dotted belt lines the wrong way. The belt should always be run so that the slack will be on the upper side.

Let it be clearly understood that there are two kinds of belts, single and double. As a matter of fact, there are more than two but the double belt is probably as thick as would be used on any small, isolated light plant. The rule for determining the necessary width of belt is: "A single belt will transmit one horse power to each inch of width, when traveling 1,000 feet per minute. A double belt will transmit just twice as much power as a single belt per each inch width." This rule is applied as follows: Supposing we have a 15-horse power engine, pulling a generator which will use the full capacity of the engine. Using a single belt, what would be the necessary width when running at 4,000 feet per minute? Since a single belt traveling 1,000 feet per minute will transmit one horse power per inch of width, then travelling 4,000 feet per minute it will transmit $\frac{4{,}000}{1{,}000}$ horse power for each inch of width, and, since we have 15 horse power to transmit we would need a $\frac{15}{4}$=3¾ inch or, say, a 4-inch single belt. If the belt was a double one a two inches would do the work, but this would not be a really practical thing. Double belts are not used for such small power transmissions.

In order to obtain the speed of the belt, measure the circumference of the engine pully and multiply this by number of revolutions per minute.

Suppose, on the other hand, taking the same example, you wished to know what size engine pulley would be necessary to get the required belt speed of 4,000 feet per minute, the engine speed being 200 per minute. First multiply 4,000×12 = 48,000, which reduces the belt speed to inches. Now divide 48,000×200 = 240, which would be the circumference of the necessary belt pulley in inches, and this divided by 3.1416 will give the diameter.

In connection with this: In order to secure the maximum efficieney belts should not be run at less than 3,000 or more than 5,000 feet per minute. It must, of course, be clearly understood that the rules given are not a hard and fast proposition; they are only approximate, since the power a belt of a given size could handle is not a definite quantity. But the rules quoted will give a belt plenty large enough to transmit the power, and any slight excess is an error on the safe side.

Leather-covered pulleys will be found to greatly diminish the tendency to slippage. The adhesion of a belt depends largely upon the surface in which it is in contact, and the leather-covered pulley will enable a belt to transmit a given amount of power without being tightened as much as would be required with an iron-surface pulley. The friction of leather upon leather is estimated at from 3 to 6 times that of leather upon iron.

Moisture is very bad for belts, therefore a belt-driven plant should never be located in a damp basement. Water tends to change the property of the grease used by the tanner, and to make a belt hard. When a belt is running, a certain amount of heat is generated both by the strain and the slippage and this, of course, expels the moisture. Conversely, when the plant is idle the belt is cold and absorbs moisture, and this operation repeated many times destroys the "life" of the leather. New leather belts should not be kept stored in a warm room for any length of time, since the animal oil of the leather and the tanner's grease will, under these conditions, dry out, and the belt will then have a tendency to crack. If a new belt seems to be stiff and hard it should be treated to a liberal dose of belt dressing before being placed in service.

It is important that your dynamo and engine be properly lined, and the best method of doing this is to stretch a fine stout cord, or a fine copper wire, as shown at B in the illustration, moving the engine or dynamo until the wire touches at 1, 2, 3 and 4, or, if one pulley is wider than the other, then have it touch at say, 1 and 2, and measure from the edge of the pulley line at 3 and 4, being sure that the distance is precisely the same in both cases. Also you may be able to loosen one of the pulleys and slip it in or out on its shaft temporarily while you do the lining.

To find the size of engine or motor pulley in order to produce a certain number of revolutions in the dynamo, multiply the diameter of the dynamo pulley by its required speed per minute and divide the product by the speed of the engine per minute, and the result will be the necessary diameter of the engine pulley. To find the number of revolutions of the generator pulley multiply the diameter of the engine, or motor pulley by the speed of the engine or motor per minute, and divide this product by the diameter of the generator pulley. The result will be the speed at which the generator will be driven.

To find the diameter of the generator pulley necessary to produce a given armature speed multiply the diameter of the engine or motor pulley by the speed of the engine or motor per minute and divide the product by the armature speed of the generator. The result will be the necessary diameter of the generator pulley.

Doomed to Get Smashed.

James Grant, Hamilton, Canada, says:

> Enclosed find a 25-cent postal note, for your small book of seventy-four questions for operators. I hope it will tell me something without a lot of study.

Well, Neighbor Grant. I am afraid that budding hopelet of yours is doomed to get smashed on the rock of G. H. W., in which G stands for good, H for hard, and W for work. The questions will not tell you one darned thing, except how much or how little you know, but if you get busy and dig out the answers to them, when you get through you will be pretty well posted.

Objectionable—Very Much So.

Tony Guglielmo, Union Hill, New Jersey, sends in a clipping from a tailpiece, "Passed by the National Board of Censors," and says:

> Would like to call your attention to the new "Passed by the National Board of Censors" tailpiece at the end of reels. I think it is very bad after sitting and looking at a rather dark scene, or a tinted reel, to then have this clear tailpiece flashed on the screen. It certainly is hard on the eyes. Also, for various reasons, the tailpiece of a reel is likely to get more or less scratched, and to accumulate dirt, and all this shows up on the screen where such a film as this is used.

Brother Guglielmo is entirely correct. The tailpiece in question consists of a shield in black, bearing the words: "Passed by the National Board of Censors," the same being on a clear, perfectly transparent ground, and this means, as the brother has said, that at the end of the reel the clear, white light of the arc appears on the screen, and, especially, if the last scene happens to be pretty dark or tinted, it is a bad strain on the eyes of an audience; also, as he has pointed out, this tailpiece will show every scratch, and all the dirt it has accumulated. It is bad, and not only bad, but rotten bad. I would respectfully suggest to the Honorable Board that exactly the opposite be used, viz.: an opaque background, with the shield and wording in white. Later: I have taken the matter up with the Board personally, and think the objectionable tailpiece will be withdrawn.

He's Got Spliced.

Our old friend, Blaine Day, otherwise J. B. Day, Sherman, Texas, who is one of the live wires, writes, thusly:

I am sending you a bale of cotton which will reach you in a few days. You know the old, old story about no more glad-time restaurants, or staying out late at night. Well, that is what happened to me the second week in June. I took out my license, at the court house, and am now a duly and fully qualified Benedict. The preacher has said words which makes the arithmetic a liar, for, in this case at least, one and one make one.

Well, we have got four sets of Hawkins' Electrical Guide here in Sherman, and you bet, F. H., they are all O. K. I would like to answer the questions, but the truth of the matter is, I haven't the time. I cut thirty-two patches out of one reel of thirty-day stuff the other day. Can you beat that? Besides running a show, I have four Powers Six A machines to keep in order, and believe me, they are kept up too, for the manager "twisted a crank himself" in the old days. So you see I have not much time for studying, but what I have I put in that way, since he who studies will be the gainer. Perhaps not right now, but some day, while he who thinks he knows it all and spends his time on the street corner, or in front of a bar, will certainly lose out. I, myself, have seen them come and go, and it is the good ones who stay.

By-the-way, here's a new way to clean the lamp-house. It's not ideal, but it is better than taking the thing out in the alley and turning it bottom side up. My new way is, just take a rag and loosen all the carbon ash, then, after removing as much of it from the bottom of the lamphouse as you can with a little tin shovel, put an extension cord on the operating room fan, open both lamp-house doors, and blow the rest of the dust out, holding the fan first on one side and then on the other. Of course, you will have to sweep up afterwards, but your lamp-house will be clean, and, on the whole, it is much less work this way.

I notice where P. D. Scott, White Sulphur Springs, Mo., is having trouble with the automatic fire shutter of his Powers Six running hard. I had the same difficulty and remedied it as follows: I removed the governor casing by loosening screw 718, Fig. 117 of the Handbook, and pulled the face plate 623, Fig. 117, off; then, first having pushed one of the weights in towards the center, I filed off just a little from each corner of the friction side of the shoe; not much, but just a little, and then, with a very fine piece of emery cloth, I polished the shoe. I then repeated the operation with the other shoe. But in doing this be very careful, and don't file too much; only file a little at a time and keep trying it, until you get it right. After you have done this, use a thin oil, and then, if the shutter does not raise right, use a little heavier oil. If this is done, and done right, friend Scott will have no more trouble.

Brother Day, the projection department and its editor wish both yourself and the new frau a long and prosperous voyage on the sea of matrimony. I sincerely hope you will have few troubles, and those you do have will be little ones. I sincerely trust the parson used good cement and that the splice will hold until the film of life has all run into the take-up of time, thence to be rewound upon the reel of happier existence in eternity.

As to the shutter idea, while I do not doubt that Brother Day made this work fine, I would advise that others experiment with caution. Because Friend Day, who is a good mechanic, is able to get away with a stunt of this kind, it does not follow that everyone else can, and it would not be a hard job to ruin the governor by filing the friction shoes, therefore, as I said, proceed cautiously.

As to blowing the dirt out of the lamp-house, why I should think, Brother Day, you would have an awful mess in the operating room, I would suggest, however, that the idea is not at all a bad one if you amend it by having a large sack made of cheese cloth, the same to be placed over one door while you, or the fan, rather, blew into the other one. The sack would then catch most of the dirt, and in that way the scheme would appeal to me as a very good one. Come, again Friend Day, and don't be so long doing it. The bale of cotton is great. I have it stored, waiting for cotton to reach ten cents per pound.

His First Difficulty.

Tennessee sets forth his troubles as follows:

Have been operating four years, and this is my first difficulty, but I am up against it now, and, as I am drawing a quarter of a hundred a week, I feel it is up to me to make good. As a matter of fact, I am ashamed of myself. Am running a new Powers Six A, with 60 amperes at the arc, through a Fort Wayne compensarc. The throw is 70 feet 6 inches, using 5" Gundlach lenses; the screen is a mirroroid. I am getting a fair picture, but should get a getter one. I have spent fourteen hours daily trying to get my condensers matched right, but cannot seem to do it. Have tried two 7½s, a 5½ and a 7½, and, after reading your article in the department, I ordered a meniscus-bi-convex combination. The meniscus cracked after ten minutes' use; moreover, it did not give me as clear a field as the two 7½ plano-convex lenses. The best result I get is with two 7½ planos, spaced as far apart as possible, with the lamp-house 15 inches from the aperture; meaning from center of combination to aperture, but this leaves me with a light streak from top to bottom of the screen. I have moved the arc backwards and forwards, also the lamp-house, and have worked on it until my brain squeaked. Can you help me out?

Well, Tennessee, in the first place, I told you fellows in the article referred to not to buy the meniscus-bi-convex lenses except that you also bought a holder for the meniscus. You disobeyed instructions, and very promptly broke your meniscus. According to John Griffiths' formula, page 430, July 18th issue, a 5½ e. f. objective ought to have two 7½ condensers, with the aperture 13⅛ inches from the center of the condenser combination, and the arc 4½ inches from the lens. According to S. Arkin, whose article appears on page 183, October 10th issue, a 5½ e. f. objective ought to have a 5½ condenser next to the light, and an 8¼ next to the film, with the condenser located 13½ inches from the aperture, presumably from the center of the combination to the aperture. I do not very much like Brother Griffiths' combination, because it seems to me there would be an excessive loss of light with the arc located 4½ inches from the condenser. Still, I am not sure, but that Brother Griffiths is right in this, because, while in the old days we used to consider 3½ to 4 inches the proper distance from the arc to lens, still, in these days of high amperage, if we maintained that distance, it is pretty tough on the lenses. This is one point upon which I do not feel exactly competent to pass judgment, and I would like a little more light on it. You need not feel so very much ashamed of yourself, Tennessee, because the lens proposition has puzzled us all. I think, if I were you, however, I would first try out Brother Griffiths' data very thoroughly, inasmuch as you already have the lenses, and then, if that don't work right, get a 5½ and an 8¼ (if you can find these lengths) lens and see how Friend Arkin's data pans out.

CAUTION: Be very certain that your optical system is in line. I think quite possibly that is the seat of a portion of your difficulty. See page 228 of the Handbook.

Has Trouble With Light.

J. A. Barnes, San Marcas, Texas, orders a Handbook and says:

I have trouble keeping my picture free from colors. Am using a Powers Six A, with meniscus-bi-convex condensers; project a 12-foot picture at 67 feet, with 110-volt a. c. through a Fort Wayne compensarc

I would suggest, Brother Barns, that you study the matter of the lamp, lamp-house and carbon setting, pages 97 to 212, inclusive, of the Handbook. I think most likely your trouble lies in your carbon setting, provided, of course, you are using 60 amperes at the arc. If you are using much less than that it will be pretty difficult to keep a clear field. Be sure that your optical system is in line (see page 228 of the Handbook), and that your condensers set parallel with each other, and that they are kept perfectly clean. It is also possible that the trouble is due, in part at least, to condensers of wrong focal lengths.

A Very Good Test.

F. W. Van Horne, Williamsport, Pennsylvania, writes:

Received the question booklet I ordered and thank you for your prompt attention. I hope you will soon have the rest of them ready, as they will make a very good test of one's knowledge. If you are willing to listen to suggestions, I would like to make one. It is not a particularly good one, but I just want to get rid of it. When the answers to about fifty or more of the questions have appeared in the department, why don't you publish them as you did the questions? They would make one of the best textbooks ever put out, and I bet you would sell lots of them.

Yes, I guess I would sell a lot of them all right, Brother Van Horne, but, strange as it may appear, it is not altogether a question of money with Yours Truly. I presume I could clear up quite a wad by publishing the questions and answers, but I am not certain if that would be to the best interest of operators. What I am afraid of, is that it would provide a lot of stereotyped answers to questions, which might be utilized by embryo operators to enable them to pass examinations without having real knowledge. This I don't care to do. However, let us hear from operators on this point. Now, don't rush in and say: don't do it! just to hear your teeth rattle, also, don't say: go ahead, old man! on the same plan. Consider the matter carefully; look it up one side and down the other, and let me know exactly what you think about it. There is not a particle of a doubt in my mind as to the good done by the Handbook, and by the department, but whether the publication of the questions and answers in book form would be good or bad—well that is something else again, and if I am convinced the effect would be bad instead of good, no amount of money I could make out of it would induce me to publish them. Let us hear your ideas on the subject, gentlemen, and you fellows who object, but who have not ambition enough to write and set forth your views, need not kick if there is sufficient response in the affirmative to give me the idea that the publication will be approved.

A Serious Question.

A. Harry Cleveland, Tacoma, Washington, contributes the following interesting letter:

> I have been a reader of the department ever since I can remember, and, having derived much valuable information therefrom, as well as some amusement, I am taking the liberty of firing one shot, the only one I have ever ventured in your direction. Enclosed you will find two pieces of film, one tinted and one black and white. These two pieces carry with them a history which, indirectly, concerns every manager, and which concerns every operator directly. The two samples were clipped from a Kalem two-reel picture, the title of which I have forgotten, and the exchange number could not, of course, identify them to anyone but the exchange. When I first ran them, all tinted scenes, in either of the two reels, would show an up and down movement on the screen, which, at times, would become so violent it gave me the "willies" to look at it. On examining the reels, I found that in some way the film had been stretched. During the day I called a friend, Park Lea, who is versed in the manufacture of film, and its treatment in the studios, and he said that the scenes which were tinted had been wrapped too tightly on the drums, and had dried that way, the effect being to stretch the film stock. By means of a pair of calipers you can determine the fact that the perforations in the two samples submitted will not fit the sprockets of any machine, or, if they did, then the sprockets of that machine would not be suitable for any other film. Also match the holes at one end with the black and white piece of film, draw it slowly between your thumb and finger, and on the other end of the two pieces you will see that the holes do not match by considerable, and these pieces are less than a foot long. You can, therefore, imagine what the effect would be if an entire reel was in this condition. But to explain this to the manager is a horse of quite another color, since he understands very little about machines or projection, and simply insists on a presentable picture on the screen at all times, and under all conditions, which was an utter impossibility in the case of these reels. I tried to explain that if the machine was at fault the result would be the same on all films, but it didn't go. Now, you are the only man in this whole United States who can save other operators in the same boat from trouble by calling the manufacturer's attention to this matter, and in the interest of the "whole bunch" I would ask you to do it.

With regard to the film, there is no question that the sprocket holes in the two pieces don't match, and apparently one piece has shrunk or stretched more than the other, but I am not at all prepared to accept the statement that tight wrapping on the racks did it. As a matter of fact, I don't think it did, because I do not believe film could be stretched that much in that way. However, I have submitted the two samples to the Kalem Company, together with your letter, and have requested them to have a careful examination made and report as to their finding. Of course, brother Cleveland, the thing is extremely aggravating, from your point of view. It's not a pleasant thing for an operator who takes pride in his work to get hold of a film which, by reason of its inherent imperfections, it is impossible to project creditably. Your manager was in error in this particular instance, and your statement that if the fault lay in the machine it would show up on all films is entirely and absolutely correct. If a machine projects one film perfectly, then it will project the other films perfectly, provided they do not contain inherent faults.

Recommended the Handbook.

C. B. Stear, Vancouver, British Columbia, writes:

> I have been out of the operating game for a long time; now I am going back to it and need a lot of oiling up; also the art of projection has gone forward and I am trying to catch up. The City Electrician of Vancouver recommended your Handbook, and I have secured it. I admire the judgment of the aforesaid C. E. I have had a lot of handbooks, but they all seemed to be copied from the same old standard, but this one is of the rank and file, and not an "arm chair general." The theater I am to get is a new one. The operating room is of concrete, 8x10 feet, with an 8-foot ceiling; ports 12x8 inches with a circular vent flue 2 feet 6 inches in diameter. The projector is a Powers Six A, supplied by a G. E. mercury arc rectifier, located in a separate room close at hand. Provincial laws call for this. Our total connected load is 6½ k. w. Will send photographs later, if you would care to use them, accompanied by full description. I have followed your book closely, and am very sorry I did not get it in time to include all the recommendations as to wiring, etc.; but have worked a lot of good ones in anyhow. Would like to get question booklet, but are Canadian stamps any good to the Yankee?

Will be glad to see the photographs, and to use them if they seem to be of interest. Yes, I tried to make the Handbook a practical guide for the operator, and the fact that it is selling almost as strongly now as when it first came out proves that I have succeeded. Often and often we get a letter from some operator containing order for the Handbook and saying: "I just examined one of your books a friend of mine got, and find it is exactly what I want. Please hurry it along." I am proud of those letters, because it shows that my efforts to make a practical work for the operator have not been in vain. As to Canadian stamps, nope!—they are no good here. I have got a nice collection of them now. However, a Canadian post office order is O. K., or I can use Canadian silver, since the banks take it in small quantities without discount. I am forwarding the question booklet and you may send the money or order.

Very Simple.

William White, Petersburg, Illinois, orders a question booklet, and sets forth his difficulty as follows:

> I had been using a Powers Six until two weeks ago, when the manager installed a Powers Six A, with a 110-volt, 60-cycle a. c. compensarc; a two-wing shutter; B. & L. projection lenses of 5-inch e. f., the throw being 70 feet. Am running on 40 amperes, and get a clear, white field. If I run about fifteen minutes to the reel the pictures are all right, but if I drop to eighteen or twenty minutes there is flicker, especially when running light scenes. Also, there is a blur not a travel ghost —at the bottom of each line of the titles, and adjusting the shutter won't take it out. I had no trouble when using a rheostat on a. c. or d. c. through a rectifier.

So far as flicker is concerned, why that proposition is thoroughly explained in the Handbook. When you reduce the speed to eighteen or twenty minutes you bring the alternations of light and darkness so far apart that the eye catches them, and with a two-wing shutter you could not possibly overcome this effect, no matter what type of machine you might use, when running at that slow speed. As to the blur at the bottom of the titles, why I have seen that same thing myself, and have remedied it, too, and yet to save my soul, at this time, I cannot remember what the cause was. Will some operater who knows the answer please address Brother White directly, and, also, if he will do so, kindly inform the editor? I am inclined to think it must be due to the lens system being out of line. See page 228 of the Handbook.

Has a Contract.

H. C. DICK, Knoxville, Tennessee, orders a Handbook and says:

> I am a member of Local 197, I. A. T. S. E., of which I am secretary. The operators of Knoxville have a contract with every house in town, and we are getting along fine. I have just one kick to make, however, and I am sure you will agree with me, and that is, they have a habit of making fun of an operator who reads the Handbook. In this way I think they are holding back their own progress, and I would be glad if you would give them a little advice through your columns. Will look forward to receiving the new Handbook, as I have about worn out my copy of the first edition.

Glad to know that Local 197 is progressing, but I will have to give its members a little talking to. Gentlemen, supposing that, instead of being a union of operators, you were an organization of civil engineers. Would you then "make fun" of one of your members who read books of instruction and tried to keep up with the progress of the times in civil engineering? Would you? What would you think of a civil engineer who made fun of one of the members of his fraternity who did that? Would you employ him if you had a job calling for a civil engineer, or would you employ a man who read, studied and kept up-to-date? Now, boys, just stop and think this matter over a minute. Don't get angry, and don't jump onto Brother Dick, because, as a matter of fact, while he has gotten you this little calling down, he has really done you a favor. Did it ever occur to you that your course in this matter is even worse than foolish? It is silly. I know this won't look good in print, but the truth, gentlemen, very often does not look well in print, and does not sound good either, but it, nevertheless, is the truth, and you cannot get behind that proposition. And now, to show you how foolish you are in this matter, let me tell you that some of the oldest and best operators in the United States were early purchasers of the Handbook, and some of them have worn one copy completely out and bought another I would also like to tell you, as further evidence, that out on the Pacific Coast, where the wage scale is double, or very nearly double, what you get, a very large percentage of the operators are owners of the Handbook, and what is more, they have studied it. Now, gentlemen, in your hearts you know you are wrong—absolutely. Instead of poking fun at the purchaser of a Handbook, you ought to send in an order yourself, and together with that order there should be another order containing $6,00 for the Hawkins' Electrical Guide. In fact, you ought to buy everything you can get that will tend to educate you in your chosen profession, and make of you better and more proficient operators. You are not a lot of children; you are grown-up men, presumed to appreciate, at least to some extent, the importance of your position in the theatrical world, yet poking fun at one of your members who is seeking to perfect himself and be an honor to your organization and your craft, comes nearer what we would expect of a child than a grown-up man. There are members of other locals than 197 who can read the foregoing with profit.

Comments on the Films

Licensed

THE MAN IN THE DARK (Edison), Oct. 20.—John H. Collins is the author of this out-of-the-ordinary picture play, which he has directed. The part of Silver Joe as rendered by Frank McGlynn is an exceptional piece of pantomimic work, especially where he is telling his life story as a human derelict, to his companions of the same strata, and which is depicted on the screen in continuous scenes, as he relates it. There are more than ordinary thrilling incidents engrafted in this story, and the acting of the entire cast is deserving of mention. A splendid release.

JIMMY HAYES AND MURIEL (Selig), Oct. 20.—A western picture drama which borders on the tragic. The plot and theme of which can lay claim to originality. It contains many thrilling scenes, in which Tom Max is featured. One must see this visualization to understand and realize the important part which an ugly horned-toad plays, as a silent witness, in vindicating the valor of its owner. An unusual release.

SUCH A MESS (Lubin), Oct. 20.—A comedy picture written by Epes Winthrop Sargent, produced by J. A. Murphy. This is a comedy of complications and mixes the characters up in a way that is certainly suggestive of the caption, "Such a Mess." It creates much laughter. On the same reel with "Only Skin Deep."

ONLY SKIN DEEP (Lubin), Oct. 20.—Another Sargent farce comedy, which Director Hevener has ably produced. The theme of this comedy is quite original and introduces a number of feminine exaggerated make-ups, which with the situations prove very amusing. On the same reel with "Such a Mess."

A WISE RUBE (Kalem), Oct. 20.—A farce comedy, featuring John E. Brennan, involving a great amount of action which takes place between two city and country cousins, each of whom are trying to best the other for the affections of a girl who has an eccentric father. How the rube wins out is quite laughable.

MOTHER O'DREAMS (Essanay), Oct. 20.—An interesting drama, which has been most ably visualized, depicting a poor orphan's dream of luxuries and a mother's love, which eventually becomes a reality. The story is by Mr. James Oppenheim, the magazine writer. It has been splendidly produced with the following cast: Ruth Stonehouse, Gerda Holmes, Richard C. Travers and Bryant Washburn. The plot of the story is ingeniously presented in a manner that is so easily grasped that text would seem superfluous.

TWO'S COMPANY (Edison), Oct. 21.—A Mark Swan comedy, directed by Charles Ransom. A love episode in which William Wadsworth and Bliss Milford are featured. They are forced to resort to all sorts of efforts to avoid interruption from different members of her family, who purposely frustrate their plans when they seek to be alone. They finally circumvent the entire family by going up in a balloon, where Charlie proposes and is accepted. A comedy that is received with great laughter.

THE FABLE OF THE LONG RANGE LOVER AND THE LOLLY-PALOOZE (Essanay), Oct. 21.—A most laughable George Ade comedy which gives Harry Dunkinson ample opportunities to demonstrate his ability as a pantomimic comedian. He is most ably assisted by Lillian Drew as a regular "Cuttie." Harry is a studious lawyer, but he forgot it when Cuttie hove on his horizon. However, he is cured when he hears her deliver her line of talk. Moral: Many Who Look the Limit Do Not Listen Very Well.

THE RAJAH'S VACATION (Selig), Oct. 21.—A comedy picture conceived by Harold McGrath. You have heard of a man having an elephant on his hands; well, it is illustrated in this picturization in a most laughable way. "Rajah" is introduced and he is a real elephant and comedian, at that, with an appetite that causes consternation; in fact he eats up all the hay in town. Finally it is concluded that too much is plenty and Rajah leaves in care of a new owner. An enjoyable release.

UNDER FALSE COLORS (Vitagraph), Oct. 21.—A farce comedy picture which is splendidly acted by Norma Talmadge, Van Dyke Brooke, Antonio Moreno, Edwina Robbins and Ethel Cozzens. The scenes are laid at Fort Henry and there is a military flavor throughout. The plot embraces complications that are not only interesting but laughable. The termination is most satisfactory and the demonstrations from those in the audience indicated that this picture was thoroughly enjoyed. The author is Jane Lennox.

THEY CALL IT "BABY" (Biograph), Oct. 22.—A burlesque on an Indian drama. There is to be a wedding of the chief's daughter and a dog is required for the wedding feast. How the dog is obtained and the subsequent action furnishes what there is of the comedy. It causes some laughter in the battle scenes. On the same reel with "His Loving Spouse."

HIS LOVING SPOUSE (Biograph), Oct. 22.—The old theme of the henpecked husband is used in this comedy in an exaggerated way. The husband attempts to gain supremacy over his muscular wife, and he does—not! Fairly amusing. On the same reel with "They Call it 'Baby.'"

SLIPPERY SLIM, THE MORTGAGE AND SOPHIE (Essanay), Oct. 22.—In this number of the Slippery Slim series, Mustang Pete and Sophie Clutts put it over on Slim and Hiram in a laughable manner. There are several incongruous happenings, but taken all in all it sizes up in good shape with those of the same series preceding it.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO. 68 (Selig), Oct. 22.—War scenes are shown as follows: German guns at Malines; scene of ruins at Malines after capture by the Germans; prisoners of war at a concentration camp in England. Other portions are a balloon race at Pittsfield, Mass.; an athletic meet at Fresno, Cal.; the Industrial Exposition at Paterson, N. J., and a fashion section of evening wraps and gowns.

THE MILL OF LIFE (Vitagraph), Oct. 22.—A dramatic picture, written by W. A. Tremayne. Maurice Costello plays the leading part and also assists in the direction. The entire cast is made up of leading Vitagraph actors, including Estelle Mardo, who portrays an emotional role effectively. There is sustained suspense in the closing scenes of a gripping nature. It seems to please the audience.

A WOMAN'S FOLLY (Biograph), Oct. 23.—The plot of this visualization is not new, and almost the same complications have been used very recently. A young widow poses as never having been married to win a man whom she genuinely loves. On account of her child by her former marriage her deception is discovered, causing quite a dramatic development. It is up to the usual Biograph standard.

MICKEY FLYNN'S ESCAPADE (Kalem), Oct. 23.—A farce comedy with an original plot. For the most part the characters are crooks of various assortments. An escaped convict, who relieves an angler of his clothes, picks the pocket of a counterfeiter and he and his sweetheart attempt to put the spurious money into general circulation. Their attempt to escape in a bum auto is very laughable.

THE GIRL IN THE TENEMENT (Lubin), Oct. 23.—A melodramatic offering, written by Olive Fuller Golden, in which she plays the leading character, Mary Davis, "A Girl in the Tenement," and in which she does some very strenuous stunts. Seymour Hastings plays the father and is also the director. There are a number of thrilling incidents, including a telling fire scene in the action, wherein Miss Golden rescues a child. The acting and photography deserve mention. A good release.

A TONSORIAL LEOPARD TAMER (Selig), Oct. 23.—An animal comedy for which Roy L. McCardell is responsible. He relates how "Mose" Jackson, a colored barber (John Lancaster), was "Cat-Nipped." It contains a laughable love story, in which brass buttons and glittering gold lace cut a big figure. Two performing leopards play prominent parts. It creates continuous laughter.

A COSTUME PIECE (Vitagraph), Oct. 23.—A comedy that is full of surprises, which are greeted with spontaneous laughter. George H. Plympton is the author. The cast is made up of Lillian Walker, Albert Roccardi, J. Herbert Frank and Harry T. Morey. Two hoboes are involved in an elopement episode; one is the real article and the other is made up for a masked ball. The troubles they get into and how they extricate themselves is creative of much laughter.

THE BROKEN ROSE (Biograph), Oct. 24.—A story of two boys, who are possessed with contrasting natures, one destructive and the other the opposite. They grow up together, and the love on the part of the one and admiration on the part of the other for the same girl intensifies their natures and leads to an almost tragedy. There is one thrilling scene. It is well photographed and acted.

BUSTER BROWN'S UNCLE (Edison), Oct. 24.—An Outcault comedy picturized from his cartoons of the same name. This one illustrates the pranks that Buster, Mary Jane and Tige play upon a visiting uncle. It is not received with as much laughter as some of those preceding it, but, however, it is very amusing. On the same reel with "A Question in Clothes."

A QUESTION IN CLOTHES (Edison), Oct. 24.—Written by George Hennessy and directed by Charles Ranson, featuring William Wadsworth and Edward O'Conner, supported by villagers, policemen, dogs, etc. The comedy is created by a hater of tramps and the tramp who is hated, and how they get mixed up and finally straighten out the complications in a manner satisfactory to both contain a surprise. Fair comedy.

BRONCHO BILLY—FAVORITE (Essanay), Oct. 24.—Mr. Anderson is supported in this offering by Marguerite Clayton, Lee Willard, Carl Stockdale and others. There is more of a love story embraced in this plot than preceding Broncho Billy releases. The usual thrilling scenes and chases take place, but on the whole it has been quite judiciously produced and entertains interestingly.

THE DEMON OF THE RAILS (Kalem), Oct. 24.—A gripping and thrilling railroad story, in which Helen Holmes is featured, and in which author Matlack and producer McGowan have certainly given the star and cast "something" to do in the way of "strenuous stunts." The entire cast ably fulfill their duties, especially Charles Wells, in his struggle with the insane engineer of the fast express, in the cab of the engine. This certainly is a thriller in all respects.

THE CROOKS (Lubin), Oct. 24.—A wide-open burlesque melodrama, written and produced by Romaine Fielding, who also plays the part of a wonderful detective. While this is an extremely boisterous comedy and contains ridiculous scenes, it seems to hit the risible faculties of the spectators with considerable force. It is well acted and, for a comedy of this nature, very enjoyable.

THE TRAGEDY THAT LIVED (Selig), Oct. 24.—A picture drama by James Oliver Curwood, illustrating the fatality of love, which has been finely produced by Collin Campbell. The plot is an unusual one and the acting is splendidly done by Kathlyn Williams and Wheeler Oakman, as Mary and John in the opening scenes. Many peculiar and startling incidents are vividly shown, during both the picture proper and the vision portion, which occurs in a dream to Mary, who, falling asleep, sees a tragedy enacted of one hundred years ago. This picture is especially interesting to fatalists or those given to "new thought."

THE SQUASHVILLE SCHOOL (Biograph), Oct. 26.—The little old red schoolhouse is certainly much derided in this visualization, and those who there received the rudiments of what education they have acquired, never saw such scenes as are depicted in this offering. It gets laughs through the absurdities foisted on the spectators. On the same reel with "The Villainous Uncle."

THE VILLAINOUS UNCLE (Biograph), Oct. 26.—A burlesque on an old fashioned melodrama. On the same reel with "The Squashville School."

WOOD B. WEDD AND THE MICROBES (Edison), Oct. 26.—Eleventh of the series exploiting the sentimental experiences of Wood B., written by Mark Swan, directed by Charles Ranson and featuring William Wadsworth. It is a sort of travesty on the microbe and bacilli theory. A vacuum cleaner, fumigation spray and a vapor bath are utilized to get him into a condition to pose as a suitor. He finally escapes clothed in the bath cabinet. This picture gets much laughter.

RIVALRY AND WAR (Essanay), Oct. 26.—A comedy in which Wallace Beery figures as producer and leading comedian. This picture is really very comical. It embroils the various characters in all sorts of funny situations which are not untangled until the closing scene. For laughing purposes this picture is certainly a success. Leo White and Betty Brown divide honors with Mr. Beery.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO. 69 (Selig), Oct. 26.—In this news pictorial is shown a procession in which El Zanbeth Shriners are shown parading through the streets of a western city and their weird ceremonies and procession to Hopi Point, in a canyon in the Sierras; Pennsylvania defeats Navy in gridiron battle; scenes of the collision between the steamships Melspan and Iowan; street scenes during Columbus Day street parade and also scenes of the water carnival at San Francisco. War scenes are shown in Louvain, German troops on guard after the invasion, ruins of Rue station, Hotel de Ville, etc., also ruins of ancient market place and St. Bierre and soldiers marching in the streets with the famous goose step. An interesting exhibition.

THE CAVE DWELLERS (Vitagraph), Oct. 26.—A very interesting and laughable comedy which Elaine Sterne has written to feature little Bobby Connelly. In the main it is juvenile and Sonny Jim and his pals have a "terrible" adventure, which proves a lesson to them. This is a very edifying visualization, and many spectators will remember their qualms of conscience and stomach after they took the first pull at father's pipe. And, Oh, Gee! the masked men and the awful noise. This picture is worth seeing.

Licensed Specials

ANNE OF THE MINES (Vitagraph), Oct. 20.—A special two-part feature, produced by Ulysses Davis from the scenario of Adele Pierce. This is a story of the mines, in the plot of which there is prevalent a great deal of treachery and intrigue. The scenes are laid in and about the mines surrounding a small mining town. There is a thrilling rescue scene of the hero by his sweetheart, after an explosion. The photography merits mention. Myrtle Gonzalez does exceptional work in the title role, and is finely supported by the others in the east. This release is generally satisfactory.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT (Biograph), Oct. 20.—A two-part picture play visualized from Charles Dickens' novel of the same name, "Martin Chuzzlewit." The action of the picture, in its various scenes, has been kept as closely as possible to the occurrences depicted by the author. Almost every one that views the picture will remember the various characters. The backgrounds, both interior and exterior, have been selected with care, in accordance with the period in which the scenes are supposed to have taken place. Acting, costuming and photography are exceptional. A fine production.

THE FALSE GUARDIAN (Kalem), Oct. 21.—A picture drama in two acts, featuring Alice Hollister, supported by Harry Millarde and a good cast of supporting actors, directed by Robert G. Vignola. From the opening scene this picture grows in interest, from the fact that it contains in its action intensity and suspense as to the finale outcome. An accidental auto wreck is one of its features. This picture holds [illegible] and is splendidly acted and photographed.

THE HOPELESS GAME (Lubin), Oct. 21.—A two-reel melodramatic picture that has perhaps been written to convey a lesson. Henry M. Lester is the author of this [illegible] production and Harry C. Myers directed it and played the leading part, that of a gambler. Rosemary Theby is the heroine and Bradley Shaw the dishonest husband. That it is finely acted goes without saying, but little can be said in favor of the plot [illegible].

HER MOTHER WAS A LADY (Lubin), Oct. 22.—A mixture of melodrama and comedy written by [illegible] and produced by John Ince, who plays the leading role. This release is in two parts and [illegible] to the long [illegible]. It has been well produced, [illegible] and the acting [illegible] above the average. There is a great deal to the conception of the scenario that seems ridiculous; however, it is not devoid of interest.

THE PRIVATE OFFICER (Essanay), Oct. 23.—Though the caption of this two-part drama is rather puzzling to the spectator at first, the development of the plot rapidly evaporates the enigma. Francis X. Bushman essays a dual role most artistically and is ably assisted by Beverly Bane, Thomas Commerford and Lester Cuneo. The plot is laid at Fort Barton and most of the scenes take place in the environments of the barracks. This visualization is very edifying.

GOODBYE SUMMER (Vitagraph), Oct. 24.—A two-part feature which is very artistically produced by a cast made up of Norma Talmadge, Antonio Moreno, Paul Scardon, Van Dyke Brooke, little Bobbie Connelly and others. Mrs. Owen Bronson is the author, who has used a theme which, while not new, is cleverly constructed. Miss Talmadge does some clever emotional work very convincingly. Some beautiful exterior scenes are used as backgrounds that have been artistically photographed. Comparatively speaking, it is an average release.

PLAYING WITH FIRE (Selig), Oct. 26.—A two-act special which uses up two reels of film in exploiting the conditions existing in a household between a man, his wife and another man. This is an old theme that has been worked so threadbare that hardly a shred is left to utilize. A foolish but innocent woman reaps her reward in the last scene, hopes destroyed by fire. Not an altogether wholesome release, but a vivid lesson to careless and thoughtless spectators.

THE LYNBROOK TRAGEDY (Kalem), Oct. 26.—A picture drama in two parts, featuring Alice Joyce, supported by a strong cast, including James B. Ross, Tom Moore, Mary Ross and Jere Austin, that most ably portray the characters in Mrs. Owen Bronson's effort, directed by Kenean Buel. The plot and theme of this release appeals to the prurient and shallow-minded spectators. It is well photographed and splendidly acted.

Independent

BILL JOINS THE W. W. W. (Komic), Oct. 25.—The slangy subtitles are the best part of this picture of the office boy's escapades. It is laughable, but is not, perhaps, so good as others of the series have been. It will go pretty well.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (Reliance), Oct. 26.—Series No. 41. In this number Margaret views New York from the Brooklyn bridge, visits a celebrated modiste, and takes some golfing lessons from Alex. Smith. The scenes are all entertaining, though there is very little plot in this number.

A MOTHER'S INFLUENCE (Majestic), Oct. 27.—Billie West and Wallace Reid play the lovers in this offering. The story is well-pictured but not very new as to plot. The couple marry against her father's wishes. Later the young husband is tempted to steal, but remembers his mother's teachings and refrains. An average reel.

A RUDE AWAKENING (Beauty), Oct. 27.—An acceptable picture of the husband's dream after a night out. He thinks that wifey is also "fast"—drinks, plays cards and tangos. That she has a dandy time in the dream will make the picture go. It is amusing and there are laughs in it.

SWEET AND LOW (American), Oct. 28.—A picture that has a very pretty story told in a charming way. It is sentimental, has a happy ending without the too harrowing things that are sometimes shown. There is a child player in it who is sure to win her way with any audience. It is a great offering for women and children.

A RACE FOR A BRIDE (Sterling), Oct. 29.—An eccentric comedy number, in which the girl's father promises her hand to the one who first brings in a justice of the peace. One of the lovers is thrown in jail, escapes, and is followed by the justice with a gun. He wins. This is fairly well presented and moderately amusing.

THE AVAILING PRAYER (Reliance), Oct. 30.—This is the story of a poor father who needs money to send his child to another climate for her health. He steals the firm's money, but is knocked down by thugs, who make away with nothing but his empty bag. He gets credit for saving the money. This story treads on very familiar ground. Its interest is helped out by good action in the latter scenes and unusually good photography throughout.

CURSED BY HIS BEAUTY (Keystone), Oct. 31.—A woman painter induces the ice man to pose for her attired in some leopard skins. Her husband and his wife appear and start trouble. The humor of this is very coarse and there is not much of a commendable nature in the film.

HIS BIG CHANCE (Victor), Nov. 2.—This clever little comedy is a [illegible] reversed version of Monsieur Beaucaire. The young princess, visiting America, passes herself off as a maid. Later she induces her mistress to pass her off as an heiress in Newport society. A fortune hunter becomes engaged to her and tires instantly when he learns she is a maid. Later, when the fact leaks out that she is really a [illegible] he [illegible]. Mary Fuller plays the part of the girl. The photography is good and the story pleasing.

THE WALL BETWEEN (Sterling), Nov. 2. A comedy number based on the familiar situation of a widow and widower living on opposite sides of a dividing [illegible] wall. They quarrel and the children bring them together. The idea has, of course, been used frequently, the settings and photography are attractive.

THEY DIDN'T KNOW (Crystal), Nov. 3. A fair comedy number, the three principal characters being Lena, Vivian and Mike and Hans. The story [illegible] rivalry for her hand. The plot is very slight and the humor [illegible].

THE STAR GAZER (Victor), Nov. 3. The [illegible] contains quite an ingenious [illegible] plot, the scenario being written by Cooper Isbondone. Murdock MacQuarrie plays the part of an old man with a telescope, through which he allows people to look at the heavens for five cents. The telescope sets the house on fire. A pretty love affair is thrown in. The [illegible] the old man is new and appealing, and the story is pleasing.

THE TIGHTWAD (Beauty), Nov. 3.—A picture especially to please the ladies, for when Tightwad has been cured, he gets all the newest conveniences to help in the housework. Housework is surely going to be easy when all the new wrinkles become cheap and handy. The story is farcical and is fresh enough to go with all kinds in the audience. It is commendable as a safe guess for the program.

THE HOODOO (Joker), Nov. 4.—A man buys a necklace to present to his wife. The maid in the park steals it and the ornament then becomes passed around through many hands. There is a general mixup of characters and the offering proves fairly amusing.

WHEN THE ROADS PART (American), Nov. 4.—A story of confidence people with a sentimental turn to its denouement that is not displeasing and that many will like well. The swindler and his woman partner are working, as brother and sister, in the house of a man whom they intend to rob. The man falls in love with the girl, but she is too true to her pal to squeal on him. She decides that her road and the swindler's must part. The lover overhears this conversation and brings her back to his house.

THE MYSTERY OF THE NEW YORK DOCKS (Imp), Nov. 5.—No. 9 of the Universal Boy series. Matty visits the docks of lower New York and discovers an unconscious girl in the hands of a gang of rascals. He aids in bringing them to justice. The plot in this is not overly strong, but serves to hold the attention.

LET US HAVE PEACE (Rex), Nov. 5.—A picture featuring Ben Wilson and Frances M. Nelson as the lovers in a film story bearing on the present European war. The fathers are retired German and French officers living in America, and when war is declared some interesting comedy situations develop. The scenes are pretty and well pictured and in the end all are neutral under the American flag.

NAN OF THE HILLS (Powers), Nov. 6.—A Western story in which the heroine hides a man pursued by the sheriff. The main incident, in which she cuts her finger so the blood on the floor will appear to be her own, has been used before, but is here worked up quite entertainingly. This offering is fairly strong.

THE TALE OF A LONESOME DOG (Victor), Nov. 6.—This picture features a trained collie dog, left in charge of an empty house. It shows how the canine rounded up a burglar until help came. The subtitles are in verse form, written by Capt. L. T. Peacock. This makes good light entertainment.

THE GIRL FROM TEXAS (Frontier), Nov. 7.—A Western number in which Edyth Sterling and Fred Church play the lovers. Joe Franz and a companion play the bad men who get the hero in their toils. The girl, who can hiss like a rattlesnake, turns the tables on them and rescues her lover. This possesses about the average interest.

MAX'S MONEY (Royal), Nov. 7.—Max Smalz falls heir to half a million. He is a butler and has found his master's pocket book, so when the detective who is looking him up comes Max's tender conscience makes him nervous. The result is a chase. This chase has the usual knock-about incidents. The picture's situation is good and it ought to go well with spectators.

WIFFLES HAS THE TOOCHACHE (Pathe).—An amusing and acceptable farce in which the most fun comes from the French characteristic gesticulations which make poor Wiffles' predicament the more laughable. There is good development of situation in the scheme and the offering will be liked.

POOR LITTLE RICH BOY (Pathe).—On the same reel is this made in America, a little comedy of children. It is slight, but entertaining "Kid" pictures usually go well.

MIKE SPLINTER, THE SPRINTER (Box Office Attractions).—A One-reel farce-burlesque of the race track melodrama. There is plenty of rough business in it and it has the quality that often seems most funny to audiences.

PIES IS PIES (Box Office Attractions).—A farce with rough business and quite a tough of Keystone quality in it. These pictures suit those whom they suit and this will, we believe, please, especially where it is bolstered by squacks and sound effects that are themselves funny, be a tower of strength on a program.

A BEAR ESCAPE (Box Office Attractions).—A burlesque farce in costumes of the romantic drama. Nero is the king and two of his courtiers have a fight over one, Ligea, a pretty slave girl, whose nose is twisted and turned sidewise. It depends on one's digestion whether a picture of this kind appeals strongly to his sense of what is funny or not.

AS A MAN CHOOSES (Warners Features).—A one-reel Premier film which handles that old theme—a squaw man with a white sweetheart waiting for him in the east—in a fairly fresh way. Its action moves very slowly and too much film was used. It is fair as an offering.

THE GREEN-EYED MONSTER (Warners Features).—A Klark Kondon script by John J. Coleman; its feature is a chase all over the house by irate and jealous husband for a neighbor whom he thinks is flirting with his wife. Rough work and breakage and the like may make it acceptable with some.

SLIM AND THE MUMMY (Warners Features).—One-reel western comic in which an awkward, clownish cowboy is compelled to sit up all night with a mummy to see that nothing harms it. He is forbidden to touch it, but does so and the mummy goes up in dust. To hide his identity he wraps himself in what remains of the mummy cloth and plays he is it. The picture, where sound effects and smacks help out, may appeal to audiences as very funny. The action is far-fetched and may prove a frost.

SOUL MATES (Warners Features).—A single-reel farce by Dot Farley and produced by G. P. Hamilton. It has a likable, amusing theme and tells how two people most unfortunate as to physical make-up get married with masks on, each thinking the other is being taken in. It makes a good offering.

RESCUED BY A RANCH GIRL (Warners' Features).—A picture taken in the southwest and showing some interesting pictures of a goat ranch and a sheep ranch among the hills of New Mexico. There is a good, snappy fighting chase of the hero and the heroine, who has set him free from a burning cabin where some rough characters had tied him up. It is a well-produced picture and will hold strongly.

HER BANDIT SWEETHEART (Warners Features).—Dot Farley, as a cowgirl, sees a man holding up the stage and takes a shot at him from the distance just as the looted stage drives on. Her bullet wings the miscreant and she follows him as he drags his booty away up the hills. Several shots are exchanged—one of his goes through her hat—then she discovers that he is Jim. This is, we believe, a new and interesting situation. It ought to make the picture go well with the average audience.

FOR HIS BROTHER'S CRIME (Warners Features).—A Premier offering in one reel with the time-worn theme of the two western brothers who love the same girl. The one who marries her is wicked and the other is self-sacrificing and goes to prison to keep his brother out. It has been well put on and has, of course, much that is new and fresh. It ought to make a pretty fair, entertaining offering.

Independent Specials

A BLOTTED PAGE (Reliance) Oct. 24.—A two-reel picture that is interesting and certainly well acted, but rather sad. A maid tells her own sad story to her despondent employer who has been ruined and whose wife has just written that she has got a divorce because she can't live with a poor man. The man had just tried to commit suicide, but now determines to call the past a blotted page. There is plenty of sorrow in the picture; but it is a strongly handled offering—except that such a subtitle as "Baby Fingers Gave Her a New Grip on Life," is not artistic but mawkish. Francillia Billington plays the maid and Sam De Grasse, the man. W. E. Lawrence has a good part as the housemaid's husband who killed himself.

A FLIGHT FOR A FORTUNE (Majestic), Oct. 25.—A two-reel number, in which the hero rides in a hydroplane to rescue the girl in a boat while she is pursued by enemies in a motorboat. This scene has been shown in other pictures, but is well handled here. The story seemed built up to fit this particular incident. It concerns a girl who is about to be robbed of her inheritance by an unscrupulous guardian, who substitutes his own daughter for her. The hero exposes the plan in a dramatic manner. This is very well photographed and runs along in an entertaining manner.

SIR GALAHAD OF TWILIGHT (American), Oct. 26.—A two-reeler full of sweet sentiment and that good, old romance that is ever new. The setting is Twilight Mountain. The characters are a trapper and his young wife who has found a picture of Sir Galahad standing at the head of his white horse. She doesn't know who he is, but is sure that he is good and true. Vivian Rich plays this girl. Two engineers come to the neighborhood. One (Jack Richardson) is anything but a Galahad. The other, and she falls in love with him, is a fairly good man (Harry Van Meter). Her husband hears of this man, learns that his little Clotilde is in love with him and throws himself from the peak of Twilight. He is referred to as the true Galahad. The working out of the story keeps this character from being offensively mawkish and makes the picture a pretty effective offering. There are some excellent scenes and good photography in it.

A MADONNA OF THE POOR (Thanhouser), Oct. 27.—A two-reel number in which a young artist employs a pretty little Italian woman to act as his model. Muriel Ostriche plays this latter part. The artist tries to make love to her despite the fact that she has a husband and child. She repulses him, but the husband, who is out of a job, sells her to the artist for money. Later he remembers the child and sends the artist away, throwing the money after him. There is a sordid note in the husband's deal with the artist and his repentance does not seem very convincing to the observer. The subject matter in this is not of the best, though the characterizations are good.

THE TURN OF THE TIDE (Imp), Nov. 20.—A two-reel offering with King Baggot and Arline Pretty in the leading roles. The story of the cancelled note, hidden in the bottom of the old chair, runs along naturally. The hero forgets his generous action in paying off the note after his injury; it is not until long afterward, when he returns from the city, that the note is accidentally found. The rescue of the girl at the last was exciting, though it was difficult to see why the crowd tried to hold back the hero. A story of a somewhat homely interest, acted in a natural, convincing way and leading up to a pleasing climax.

THE RUIN OF MANLEY (American), Nov. 2.—A splendid two-reel subject in which the chief feature is a wonderful pigeon farm near Los Angeles. This farm is shown during a disastrous flood, the chief scenes being taken by a cameraman who chanced to be on the spot. The scenario writer has built up very skilfully a pleasing story to go with these central scenes and the subject proves both unusual and appealing. Ed Coxen and Winnifred Greenwood play the lovers. The photography is very good. A fine offering.

THE RETURN (Eclair), Nov. 4.—A Western offering in two reels, the cast including Robert Frazer, Edna Payne and Norbert Myles. The hero loses the love of his sweetheart through an inherited love of drink. She weds his rival. Some years later the hero, now reformed, is a Texas ranger. The rival, Evans, has turned out badly and deserted his wife to become a bandit. The hero rounds him up and there is a strong scene in which the wife unwittingly shoots her own husband to save her former lover. This offering has plenty of action and is of about average strength.

THE DESPERADO (Broncho), Nov. 4.—A two-reel Western number with some new touches in it. "Mom," the outlaw's pipe-smoking mother, is a good character but, though she is far from being a good woman. Her efforts, as well as those of the girl to save the ill-fated Jim from his pursuers, are pathetic. This is a relentless picture of rough Western life as Bret Harte might have described it had he been a scenario writer or producer. A well-drawn chart for like "Mom" will put a strong interest into any film. A successful offering of rough Western life.

IN OLD ITALY (Domino), Nov. 5.—A two-reel, Ince and Spencer production. Although not actually taken in Venice, Italy, the lagoons, gondolas and other settings suggest the famed city. The story is one of comparatively simple plot. Raniero, the villain, lures a young girl to follow him and is pursued by her parents and Antonio, assisted later by gendarmes. The action itself never becomes strongly dramatic, but the production is pleasing because of the artistic scenes and attractive photography.

IN THE CLUTCHES OF THE GANGSTERS (Kaybee), Nov. 6.—A two-reel story dealing with a young girl's adventures in the hands of a rough gang. The first scenes are taken on an excursion steamer, where she meets Chick. Their love affair develops and he attempts to reform. The gang makes an effort to get him back, but fails. This story lacks any very strong central idea and the plot seemed made up of numerous more or less disconnected scenes. Some of the characters are quite pleasing, but the yarn itself is not overly strong.

THE JUNGLE MASTER (Bison), Nov. 7.—A two-reel jungle story, with Rex Roselli, Val Paul, Marie Wolcamp and others in the cast. The plot is negligible, being a mere thread of interest on which to hang the incidents, which have to do with a lot of wild beasts. Lions, leopards, chimpanzees and even snakes are all given a turn, and some decidedly interesting developments result. The capture of the lion, first in the net and later in the cage, was most interesting. The scenes are all well photographed. Rex Roselli demonstrates a strong control over the beasts of the jungle.

A SOLDIER'S DUTY (Pathe).—Special Feature, a picture made in the Pathe studio in Sweden and showing some of the peculiar and charming scenes of the northern kingdom. The story is not strictly dramatic, but is interesting and clearly told. The acting and general staging, which includes photography, are of high order.

A CHANGE OF HEART (Pathe).—A two-reel picture made by Wurton, Inc., for the Pathe program and dealing with a confidence man whose sleeping conscience is touched by what an old lady (he and his accomplices are about to fleece her) says about his mother's picture. He forces his unwilling accomplices to give up the money just taken from the lady, and while he is on his way to carry it back to her, the others are arrested. It is a good story and makes a fair offering, though it would have been stronger in one reel, perhaps.

THE GREAT SECRET (Box Office Attractions).—A three-reel picture from the White Star studio. It features Edwin August and tells an old story—that of the borrowed "diamond" necklace of paste stones that is lost and replaced by real gems at a terrible sacrifice. Yet there is a new twist and it has been brought up to date and set in America. The opening scenes are at the seaside and then in a large city. There is some excellent acting, not only by Edwin August, but by his whole cast. The leading woman is very pretty besides, and there are many beautiful scenes in it.

LITTLE SUNBEAM (Box Office Attractions).—A three-reel picture from the Balboa studio, featuring Jackie Saunders. It tells a sweetly sentimental story good enough to carry even that too-long deathbed scene at its opening. This scene is well done and effective, and that is why it ought not to have been so long. People do not like long deathbed scenes—we find it true everywhere. There is good acting and pleasing scenes all through the picture and, while not a great production, it is one of the kind that many will take much pleasure in.

The Photoplay and Criticism

Western Newspaper Says the Screen Is Entitled to Equal Recognition With the Stage.

(From the News, Milwaukee.)

The other day a reader of the Daily News said that a criticism of a certain moving picture production which appeared in our columns was rather "too strong," as it was only about a film show. The reader expressed the idea that such analytical criticisms should be reserved exclusively for the legitimate stage performances. His theory was that the regular press agent matter or mere news comment would suffice in these instances.

This shows that we have not reached a full recognition of the place of the screen drama in the theatrical domain. But that this criticism appeared is vital evidence of the recognition to which it is attaining. In fact, there is no reason why cinematographic art should not be treated on the highest possible plane by all those who write about it. It is as much subject for critical review as any other.

We are now getting some of the greatest actors and actresses in this work; a number of the most noted novels are made into scenarios. The finest plays of today and the past generation are presented on the screen. Shakespeare, Victor Hugo, and the renowned dramatists of many countries have been put into life for the people through this means.

The newspapers, then, must treat these subjects seriously and in the dignified manner they deserve. There are very many picture stories unworthy even of passing comment, and thousands entitled only to that; but, on the other hand, there are an ever-increasing number deserving extended review from the standpoints a dramatic critic for a daily newspaper devotes to so-called legitimate theatricals. There necessarily will be some differences in the treatment of the regular play and the moving picture performance; but the latter is coming into its own as requiring and deserving especial treatment in the dramatic columns of the daily newspaper.

Mona Darkfeather

JUST as soon as the lithographs are ready, Sawyer, Inc., will release four two-reel "Mona Darkfeather" dramas, of which they have received negatives. These were all directed by Frank Montgomery, and show the Indian princess in roles giving her ample opportunity to display her acting ability. All four of the pictures are Western in sentiment, but so carefully produced that the overacting common to this style of picture has been avoided. Great care has been taken in reproducing Indian customs, and the splendid aggregation of players surrounding the star have all proved their worth. The titles of the four pictures are "The Witch of the Sierras," "The Skull Worshippers," "Priest or Medicine Man?" and "Her Vindication." Magnificent scenic surroundings and perfect photography add much to the value of these pictures. Releases will take place in November.

Mona Darkfeather.

Recently Princess Mona had a very thrilling experience. While making a run before the camera at the head of thirty Indians, she saw a huge tarantula on the mane of her horse, Beauty. A bite from this six-inches-wide spider meant agonizing death—this she knew. But she did not know how to get rid of it, as she was riding bareback, and had no riding whip. Almost quicker than it takes to tell it, the tarantula had made a leap, and landed on her bare arm. Fortunately, a Sioux Indian, one of the company, brought his horse abreast of hers in the nick of time, and with his six-shooter brushed the tarantula from her arm. But it made still another leap, this time to the Indian's horse. He could afford to take no chances, and so fired his revolver at it, point blank. Although it was only a "blank," it killed the insect, and hardly wounded the horse. That evening, however, it was found that some of the poison must have been blown into the horse by the charge, and the beast being in agony, they had to shoot it to stop its suffering.

CORY ORGANIZING CALIFORNIA EXHIBITORS.

W. A. Cory, secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of California, has started on a tour of the State by automobile for the purpose of interviewing every exhibitor who can be reached and soliciting membership in the organization. The number of drastic measures now being prepared for introduction at the next session of the State Legislature makes it imperative that the organization be strengthened and the most determined campaign for membership is now under way. The initiation fee has been reduced to $5, and this includes all dues up to the first of the year. Mr. Cory will first visit the Santa Clara Valley section, and then work down the coast to San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara and Los Angeles. He expects to remain in the latter city about two weeks.

WILL SEEK REPEAL OF OHIO CENSOR LAW.

J. W. Binder, director of publicity and finance, and Dr. Orrin G. Cocks, advisory secretary of the National Board of Censorship, have just returned from a week's tour of the state of Ohio where they went to secure first hand information as to the workings of the Ohio censor law and the opinions of those affected by the law. They discovered that there were many complaints of unfairness, delays, and other annoyances. It is said that the Board of Censors makes no attempt to fix standards or to advise manufacturers why their pictures have been rejected. It is also stated that the penal section of the act has been declared invalid in one of its provisions, allowing exhibitors to run pictures without the official leader carrying the Board's approval.

As a result of these investigations the National Board of Censorship proposes to start a campaign to secure the repeal of the law.

New Bill at Vitagraph Theater.

"The Fates and Flora Fourflush" and "Sylvia Gray" Inaugurate Fortnightly Change of Program.

ON Monday, October 26, the Vitagraph Theater inaugurated its new policy of a change in program every two weeks. The first subject was the single-reel picture, the regular release of the day, "The Cave Dwellers." Bobby Connelly was featured in one of Elaine Sterne's "Sonny Jim" stories, produced by Tefft Johnson. Then came "The Fates and Flora Fourflush," a three-part burlesque which, we are warned, is not to be taken "too seriously." The subject is described as "the massive ten-billion-dollar Vitagraph mystery serial by the great (but unknown) Scandinavian author, Kjarl Brjown, S. H. (Square Head), in collaboration with a number of other alleged humorists." The comedy will be especially appreciated by those who have followed more or less closely the various serials of adventure which have in recent months been so popular. The chapters are entitled "Treachery in the Clouds," "The Treasure Temple of Bhosh" and "A Race for Life." Clara Kimball Young heads the cast. Those who saw "Goodness Gracious" need not be told what Miss Young can do in burlesque. Aiding and abetting or rather always villainously pursuing Flora was L. Rogers Lytton, as Sir Simon Blackheart. This was a real team. Templer Saxe, too, was a rajah who really rajaed, according to the printed cast, and the tip seemed to be right. Frank Goodheart was an honest White Wing hero, with his trusty, dusty broom always on the job. It is just possible that "The Fates and Flora Fourflush" will thrill with more or less savage joy many picturegoers.

The last number on the program was the four-part subject "The Strange Story of Sylvia Gray," written and produced by Charles L. Gaskill. Helen Gardner played the double role of Sylvia Gray, wife of Henry Gray, and Silvery, her daughter, an artist's model. Charles Kent was Henry Gray. Mary Charleson plays the maid who watches out for the daughter in infancy and young womanhood. Gladden James is Lennox, the clubman who induces Mrs. Gray to leave her husband. Charles Dietz is Dr. Frankenstein, a hypnotist. Evelyn Dumo is Vivette, a medium. The picture is well acted. It will more strongly entertain those who are interested in the psychic.

EDWARD AUGER SUCCEEDS KANE.

Edward Auger, one of the best known film men, has been appointed manager of branches for the Eclectic Film Company, vice Arthur S. Kane, resigned.

Mr. Auger was born in Dorchester, Mass., his family moving to Canada when he was nine years old. Over ten years ago he became interested in the motion picture business and soon graduated from the ranks of exhibitors into the exchange end, becoming general manager of the Ouimetoscope Film Exchange in Montreal. An engagement with the Kinetograph in Canada followed, during which he traveled from New Brunswick to British Columbia. The General Film Company then offered him the managership of its St. Louis branch, which he accepted. When the Eclectic Film Company started opening up its exchanges Mr. Auger was tendered the position of inspector of branches, which he accepted and held up to the moment of his promotion.

Few men in the film business are as well known as Mr. Auger. From coast to coast and from Winnipeg to New Orleans his acquaintances and friends are legion. Their good wishes follow the big man with the smiling face as he takes up his new duties.

FAMOUS PLAYERS TO PUT ON "OLD HOMESTEAD"

The Famous Players are now making preparations to produce the film version of "The Old Homestead" in Swansea, the New Hampshire village which suggested the drama to its author, and to use the very house that is featured in the title of the subject.

The play is one of the greatest theatrical successes of the time, and was performed by Denman Thompson for more than three decades. In 1875, while playing in Martin's Variety Theater at Pittsburgh, Pa., the already well-known actor suffered a severe attack of rheumatism, and while helpless in bed conceived the plot of "Joshua Whitcomb." This sprang into instant popularity and was transformed some years later into "The Old Homestead." It is estimated that over twenty million people have laughed and cried over "The Old Homestead," in the United States and Canada alone.

Exhibitors Write to Kalem Company.

Four Thousand Reply to Request for Frank Criticisms of Output—Wide Demand for Railroad Series.

IN following out a policy which has obtained in the executive offices of the Kalem Company for several years, letters were recently sent out to 7,000 licensed exhibitors asking for frank expressions of advice as to the company's product. If any one had complaints to make he was invited to register them; if there were any suggestions as to changes in class of plays they would be welcomed. Already over 4,000 replies have been received, and it is said they were filled with just the sort of information the company wanted. As a result two companies have been completely reorganized.

Many exhibitors spoke in praise of the series of two-part pictures in which Alice Joyce has been featured, the factor most appealing to them being the independence of each issue of preceding releases. The exhibitors also expressed their gratification over the forthcoming single-reel series entitled "The Hazards of Helen," in which Helen Holmes is to be featured in railroad stories. These will be released on a stated day each week, so that the exhibitor may arrange his advertising accordingly.

"We have gone to considerable expense to get scenarios especially adapted to Miss Joyce," said an officer of the Kalem company this week, "and the same is true of the railroad pictures. We made a contract with the Santa Fe Railroad for the use of locations and material. Without doubt these railroad subjects have been costing us more than will be spent ordinarily on two-reel pictures, but the expenditure has been justified. Following the announcement of the making of these railroad stories the exhibitors have been putting in orders for them to such an extent that the exchanges have been sending in requisitions for extra prints. The first release of 'The Hazards of Helen' will be 'Helen's Sacrifice,' on November 14."

Box Office Producers.

Tips on the Men Who Will Make Pictures for William Fox's Company.

WILLIAM FOX, president of The Box Office Attraction Company, has engaged an all-star producing force the members of which are J. Gordon Edwards, Edgar Lewis, Frank Powell, Lloyd B. Carleton and James De Carlton. They all have big reputations and have in the past produced some of the best known work both on the legitimate stage and the moving pictures.

J. Gordon Edwards, well known in Europe as well as in this country, for the last few years has been associated with Mr. Fox producing the plays at the Academy of Music. Mr. Edwards has produced some of the biggest stage successes on Broadway and the Strand. He has to his credit the staging of more than 500 plays.

Edgar Lewis, who has just completed the production of "The Thief," Henri Bernstein's great play, with Dorothy Donnelly in the star part, is known for his work with the Life Photoplay Company. His productions, "The Littlest Rebel," a Broadway triumph, and "Captain Swift," are regarded as his best examples in picture craftsmanship.

Lloyd B. Carleton, who has produced "The Walls of Jericho," the famous James K. Hackett production with Edmund Breese in the star part, formerly asociated with the Lubin Company, has produced some of Lubin's biggest attractions.

Frank Powell, who for two years has been specializing in the production of big feature attractions, has joined the William Fox forces after having put on an elaborate attraction for George Kleine. Mr. Powell is now preparing for the screen the well-known Klaw & Erlanger production, "A Fool There Was," by Porter Emerson Browne, in which originally appeared Robert Hilliard and Pauline Fredericks. Mr. Powell has distinguished himself in the Biograph, Universal and other large producing companies.

"CABIRIA" FOR PICTURE THEATERS.

Harry Raver announces that "Cabiria" will soon be available for exhibition in all picture theaters on a rental basis. "Cabiria" has been running in New York for six consecutive months; in Chicago five months; in San Francisco nine weeks; Atlantic City two months, and from four to ten weeks in others cities. Since July fifteen companies with full equipment have been touring the country with great success. Hundreds of applications are being received by Mr. Raver from exhibitors who want "Cabiria" for their houses, so that its continued success on a rental basis is assured.

"What's His Name"

Lasky Picture of Life's Illusions, from McCutchen's Novel—It's Full of Brave-Hearted Humor.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

HERE is one of those stories without any pretense that has things in it as deep as the human soul. It is a story of village life in which the tantalizing Metropolis plays a big part. Harvey, its hero, works at a soda fountain and has married Nellie. They are just a couple of unsophisticated youngsters who don't know anything. Nellie is pretty and inexplicable fate put in her way an offer to become one of the chorus. Twenty dollars a week looks big in the village. The manager won't take Harvey; but we see him carrying the satchels to the train. He is soon to become, "What's His Name," Miss Duluth's husband.

Nellie, "Miss Duluth," isnt' hampered by any Puritanical questionings. Life and all its new adventures fascinates her and she is making plenty of money. Harvey, who has been acting as nurse girl to their baby daughter, is now boxed off to a house in Tarrytown with a cook and maid to help him. Mr. Fairfax, the millionaire, attracts Nellie. There are some dramatic scenes, then she goes to Reno while Harvey with the child, both ragged, tramps homeward to Planeville. At length, just before Nellie gets her divorce, the baby falls sick and Harvey telegraphs to her. A change of heart has been coming and she hurries back to Planeville.

The scenes that fill in this outline and give life to the story are fresh, have been produced to seem natural, and hold interest through five reels with ease. But the quality of the offering comes from its humor, which lies deep and is sincere. For instance, in the wreck and ruin of his home, when Nellie, on her way to Reno, has sent men in to pack and store the furniture from under his feet, Harvey comes on a "God Bless Our Home" brought from the village house, and finds courage to laugh over it. One begins to find the very qualities that made Harvey willing to be "What's His Name" endearing him to us. He is no coward or fool, and Max Figman, who plays the role, has hit Harvey off finely. His work is very satisfying.

In the role of Nellie there are things that have to be carefully handled and Lolita Robertson has done wonders in the way of bridging over, smoothing out and keeping the woman seemingly convincing. Then, too, humor has always been a saving grace, the best thing in the world for making a slightly unbelievable situation plausible. It excites admiration and that is criticism's perfect antidote. Miss Robertson is amply able, when it comes to picturing human things, as notice that change of heart on arriving at Reno, and also when it is necessary to bring out humor. She's a charming Nellie.

Cecil de Mille is responsible for the direction and Wilfred Buckley made the scenes. The production must have been difficult on account of the condensation, but it is filled with signs of good direction. The players to the last helper are natural and acceptable. The photography is excellent. It makes an especially pleasing offering that can be depended on safely.

The story is wholly unconventional and has a philosophy that the average spectator will like. To us the best group of scenes in the picture are those that show the adventures on the way home.

"Shore Acres"

All Star Picture from Hearn's Drama of New England Shore Folks Holds Well.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE best thing in Hearn's play is its strongly contrasted New England characters. It is a good story too and the author of the photoplay script, Louis Reeves Harrison, has ably picturized it. In the play the struggle of the brothers at the foot of the light house stairs is, with its dialogue, the big dramatic scene. The picture, after developing the part the scheming character, Blake, has in the story, amplifies this act. We see the struggle perhaps in a more natural light; for, we see the boat in the storm fighting rough seas (photographs taken on a boat in rough weather almost double the impression of the waves) and see the rocky reef in its way. Then the lay of the land between the lighthouse and the farm is clearer and the increasing madness of Martin, which has grown so marked that even Blake tries to check it, is shown in more detail. Those scenes in the boat during the storm are, by the way, thrillers.

There are historical reasons why New England bred extremes of character and the altruistic brother, Nat, and the hard brother, Martin, in the same generation is a truthful picture. Blake, the scheming, materialistic visionary, is also convincing. The love story of Martin's daughter, Helen, and the doctor, Sam, which works out to a delightful home coming at Christmas, logically gets its help and hindrance from the interaction of these three characters as is clearly presented in the picture. Blake, as drawn by E. J. Connely, is filled with good atmosphere. It is a fine bit of acting and the character has been heightened by the director's handling of it. William Riley Hatch's portrayal of Martin also rings clear and true. Nat, played by Charles A. Stephenson, is filled with subtle distinctions that are hard to get over, but is presented with skill and satisfies. Pretty Violet Horner plays Helen and Sam is taken by Conway Tearle. Gladys Fairbanks plays Helen's mother. All the cast do good work.

The characters are not introduced so as to be clear at once to all. Even now the picture can easily be strengthened by an added subtitle to the effect that Martin and Nat are brothers living on the same farm. This could be given in place of the merely ornamental scene called "Sunset." It would also help if in introducing Helen the subtitle said Scene from "Shore Acres" (All Star).

"daughter of Martin and niece of Nat." This merely for the sake of clearer understanding at the opening.

There is good Christmas feeling in the last act which is emotional and greatly pleasing. Indeed, while the offering is commendable for any and all times, it is especially desirable for holiday shows. The director, John A. Platt, has been successful in handling not only the tense moments of the drama, but the moments of sentiment, particularly the scenes in which the younger children at the shore farm are the center of attention. The camera work is excellent.

The scenes taken on board the schooner as it makes its way out to sea against a wind, plunging its prow again and again into the whitening billows, will excite the most appreciative comment everywhere, but especially along the coast, where such scenes are known.

"The Wishing Ring"

Pretty, Idyllic Love Story of Old England and Cheery Boy and Girl Romance—Released by World Film.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE reviewer felt while enjoying this offering in five reels, that a big audience around him would have been of material help in estimating its value as entertainment. The story it tells is very pleasing, there can be no doubt of that. Slight in texture like all delicate things, it gives a truly first-love story in all its June rose-time perfume and vernal sweetness. The characters, too, are pleasing; for most of them have been pictured in that fairy-tale region where things are only a bit more substantial than dreams. One or two of these characters haven't been so pictured and for the moment, while they are in the picture's center, its illusion is quite gone. The only object of such a picture is human joy which is as real and yet as impalpable as June sunlight. You can gather a cup of sunlight, but to keep it filled you have to leave it out doors and can't bring it into a cold human house. In order to see sunlight you must have matter; sunlight has to shine on something to be seen, and where sunlight is desired for itself, it is better to have the cup not thick, but as thin as possible.

And this is why I believe that the picture, excellent as it surely is from the exhibitor's viewpoint and as an offering of entertainment, would have been even better if that opening scene, which is surely not idyllic, been shortened as much as possible and if, to take one other instance, that scene in which the Squire discharges his gardner had been acted in not quite so realistic a way. Yet, as we have pointed out, the sunshine of the picture's love story brightens through even these opaque places. This is because most of its characters are for most of the time true to the atmosphere. Among them all, none is truer than Alec Francis, in the role of the gouty Earl of Bateson. Chester Barnett has the role of his son and does very well in it. He gets caught in a school scrape and is in disgrace and has run away from the Earl to his god-father, the Squire. This man has just had a quarrel with his gardener and the lad is left in charge while the Squire is absent. While on guard he catches Sally, the pretty daughter of the parson, stealing flowers. She wants them for the church and thinks that God made flowers for all and that to take them wasn't stealing them. This girl is played by Vivian Martin and she makes the girl very charming indeed. Sally helps smooth out his quarrel.

The picture tells its story clearly and is very well staged on the whole. There are many scenes that are absolutely perfect in suggesting the atmosphere of just this story. Perhaps the interiors at the parsonage are the most worthy of praise, but there are many others almost as excellent. The photography is clear. The story is by Owen Davies and has been picturized by Maurice Tourneur. A very good offering.

JEFF DOLAN WITH FILMS LLOYD.

Some time ago we had inserted in these columns a notice to the effect that Jeff Dolan was out and wanted to get in. This same little Jeff is anxious to let you all know that he is now looked upon as a regular film salesman, for which he gets a weekly allowance from Messrs. Joe Miles and Charles Feature Abrams, which he calls a salary for duties performed in the interest of the Films Lloyd Co., suite 1003, Candler Building, 220 West 42d street, New York.

"The Perfect Thirty-Six"

Cloak Model, Her Boss and the Drummers Make Perfect Feature Comedy—From Pathe German Studio.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

TO BEGIN with, Montague Glass has written his mixture of humor and philosophy into the American subtitles that go with this, "The Perfect Thirty-Six" picture, and they add laughter to what is already perfectly amusing—it's like candy on good cake. The heroine, "the perfect thirty-six"—most spectators will know that it refers to a perfect cloak model, thirty-six size—is a sprightly young Miss who knows that she isn't a "dead one." Her adventures in a big Berlin clothing store, how she got there, and how it came that later she married the boss, have a quality that will fill the house with the heartiest kind of laughter. There is no doubt about it at all, and the picture will be as welcome in the neighborhood house as in the downtown theaters and will, if it is shown downtown in any city be demanded by the neighborhood spectators, who will surely hear of it from their husbands.

The quality that makes this a special and decidedly strong feature comedy offering is in the acting; there isn't a single weak spot noticeable in the production. From the "perfect thirty-six" herself to the other models—it is said that the best professional models in Berlin were hired to play in the picture; and they are surely pretty—down to the doorkeeper at the employees' entrance of the department store, all add to the fun, and none ever gets in the way. There is hardly a character in it who by acting naturally does not, so to speak, play jokes on himself for the spectator's benefit. And the unconsciousness of these characters makes them rich in fun. Phillipshon, the drummer, is the one who discovers her in the clothing store of her aunt in a small town. He has the boss hire her. Perhaps he feels a certain proprietorship; but he isn't there when she arrives in Berlin, and Jacob, the boss's nephew, invites her out to dinner with him—they go to a place in Berlin that corresponds to Child's. How he loses her is only one of the bright patches of the picture.

There is nothing cheap in the way the picture has been staged; and besides its thoroughly interesting and laugh-making story it has glimpses of German life in the country and in Berlin, plenty of pretty girls and stunning gowns. The sets are all that could be desired, and the photography is perfect. It is one of those offerings—it is four reels long.

—that make the exhibitor send them back after a markedly successful run with the half-melancholy regret that there are not more as good. It is not hampered by vulgarity. There is no wearisome padding and no reason why it shouldn't be booked for the most critical neighborhood theater in the country.

"The Ruin of Manley"

A Pleasing and Original Subject in Two Reels by the American, in Which Love and Business Are Happily Intermingled.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

A CHARMING love story, of an original type, with several fine exteriors that are educational in character, has been filmed by the American at Santa Barbara under the title, "The Ruin of Manley." This story has been collaborated by Marc Edward Jones and Thomas Ricketts, and the latter also directed the production.

During the great floods in the vicinity of Los Angeles, about nine months ago, great havoc was wrought and heavy losses sustained by various industries. In this story the American shows evidence of fine foresight by taking advantage of the destruction of the Los Angeles pigeon farm by the rush of waters of the flood, where 1,000,000 pigeons were homed. The spectacle was filmed at the time by one of the camera men, and the incident was seized upon as the nucleus of a story to be written and filmed later on. The plan has now been realized, and how well it has been carried out will be shown for the first time on Nov. 2, the date of release of the "Ruin of Manley."

On this simple story, which treats of the love affairs of a country lad and his lass, Director Thos. Ricketts has bestowed much of his painstaking art. He has cast the characters most happily and he has succeeded in investing the story, as seen in the films, with strong, continuous interest. I cannot recall a single instance of padding in the 2,000 feet, which is quite a compliment for a production of this type of subject. The settings are most appropriate and several of the exteriors show thrilling scenes.

Mary (Miss Winnifred Greenwood), and Manley (Ed. Coxen) are the lovers. Manley works on the ranch of Mary's father, but he fails to give the old man satisfaction as his natural inclination is to raise pigeons. "One kind of work's as good as another for any boy" is the opinion of the old ranchman, who looks on Manley as a lazy good-for-nothing. It will not be surprising, therefore, to learn that Manley was fired ignominiously and that he went out into the world to find a job to his liking.

"I'm going away, and when these hands can support you, I'm coming back," he says to Mary as he kisses her goodbye. Sure enough, he finds a man who gives him a chance at pigeon-raising, and he succeeds so well that his employer offers to back him in a similar enterprise for himself.

Manley returns to Mary's home a new man, with confidence in himself and worthy the confidence of others—Mary's father among them. He purchases a tract of land on a sandy bottom near a river for his pigeon farm, and laughs at the old timer who warns him not to build there, as the river had once overflowed within his recollection and that it would do so again.

The extensive pigeon houses have been built and are filled with nearly a million birds, within a year or so. Then a misunderstanding arises between Mary and Manley, wholly her fault, and she returns him her engagement ring. To escape from memories that hurt, she pays a visit to friends in the city. While there a fearful rainstorm, prolonged for days, breaks on that section of country. She thinks of Manley and his pigeons and of the fast rising river. In the midst of her fears, she learns that she had misjudged her lover, and sets out for home to be near him in his misfortune.

When she arrives, only a vestige of Manley's pigeon farm is left by the flood, and she finds him among the ruins, disconsolate and dismayed, as a great flight of his homing pigeons circle around and light on the spot. Mary snuggles close to him, in deep contrition and love, and whispers that she has come back to be with him as he begins all over again.

Miss Greenwood is a charming Mary and Ed. Coxen is a fine type of the country lad, Manley, who is determined to find his lifework. The father of Mary is well represented by John Steppling, and George Field plays the part of the villain of the story with force and discretion. The minor parts are all faithfully impersonated.

"For Her Father's Sins"

A Two-Reel Majestic of Fine Purpose and Admirable Treatment.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

CAST:

Blanche Sweet
Billie West
Wallace Reid
Al Felson

A WELL-TOLD story, its interest strengthened by realistic fidelity of detail, "For Her Father's Sins," has only the fault of a misleading title. Billie West, a young actress of intelligence and dark beauty is first shown as a girl with a modest home and a manly brother, and we begin to look for the father whose sins she is to atone. He does not appear. Billie is ambitious and weary of her narrow environment, she strikes out on her own account by going to the city and leaving a note behind, telling her brother that she has gone to seek employment and independence where he cannot find her. Her experience is the usual one of disillusion, and it is convincingly used to indicate the terrible pressure brought to bear upon those least able to stand it under our present social system. The ensuing situations have the force of truth in them—the girl is driven to desperation by the avarice of her employers.

We begin to understand the title when Blanche Sweet, looking sweeter than ever, appears, fresh from school, the idolized daughter of a capitalist, who owns the very store where Billie is being driven to despair. The sins of Blanche's screen father are those needing atonement or readjustment. The quick sympathies of Blanche lead her straight to a solution of the social problem when she meets starving Billie, and through Billie's brother the working girl's heart-breaking situation is fully revealed. Blanche gives of her own blood, by transfusion, to save Billie and nearly perishes from weakness. Her father is brought to the scene by rather awkward means—by reading in a newspaper that such an operation is to take place—it is unheard of in medical practice to publish contemplated operations—and the old tyrant melts. He breaks down and makes ample restitution to those he has so deeply injured.

Excepting the minor faults noted, this story is strong and sweet, far above the average of its kind, and handled with great skill.

Washington Exhibitors' Ball.

Big Gathering Planned for at Convention Hall, Saturday, October 31.

EVERYTHING is in readiness for the grand ball and banquet of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia, Saturday evening, October 31, in Convention Hall, said to have the largest continuous floor space of any hall in the country. The reception committee will be on hand to meet the fifty or more photoplay actors and actresses who have accepted the invitation of the League to be present on this occasion and to participate in the festivities. The stars of all the producing companies now working in the east are to come to Washington on the Congressional Limited operated by the Pennsylvania Railroad. Upon their arrival they will be taken to the Raleigh Hotel where a large number of rooms have been reserved for them and where every attention will be paid them to make their stay in the National Capital a most pleasant one.

The big hall has been elaborately decorated with bunting, flags, palms and ferns and cut flowers; the novelties and favors which are to be presented to those who attend have long since been received, but the entertainment committee refused to divulge the nature of these, holding them for a great surprise.

A feature of the ball will be the taking of moving pictures which will later be shown in the various houses here and possibly may form a section of the news service produced in this city.

The following is the composition of the various committees which did much good work and to whom credit for the success of both the ball and the banquet is due: Decorations—Ira LaMotte, Alan Bachrach, Nathan Stein and Harry S. Wolf; publicity—Fulton Brylawski, Harry Crandall and Dr. Herbst; program—Victor H. Stonesifer, R. H. Campbell, Thomas M. Eastwood; music and entertainment—J. P. Morgan, Julian Brylawski, J. J. Payette and Maurice Davis. The reception committee is a committee of the whole league with a membership of about fifty exhibitors.

Earl Wilson and Clara Kimball Young have been selected to lead the grand march. They will be followed by the other photoplay actors and actresses, the members of the League and their ladies, invited guests, and the public. It is expected that many prominent officials, both of the federal and city governments, will participate in the festivities and a number of acceptances of invitations have already been received.

The World correspondent made a hurried canvass of the exchanges to feel out the sentiment of their personnel with respect to the ball and it is the opinion of all that this will be one of the best boosters of the moving picture industry that it would be possible to obtain. The mere fact that the photoplayers will be in Washington will, in itself, prove a valuable means of advertising the business and the thousand dollars' worth of space donated by the Washington Post is an admirable gift.

MASSACHUSETTS LEAGUE TO HAVE A BALL.

The second annual ball of the Massachusetts Exhibitors' League is scheduled to take place at the Boston Arena, Boston, Mass., on the evening of Wednesday, December 2. Samuel Grant is chairman of the committee in charge. The Boston Arena is one of the largest auditoriums in the country and will accommodate about twelve thousand people. The committee is planning the entertainment on a large scale and is assured of an attendance of popular players and producers in greater numbers than have ever before appeared at a similar occasion.

Special features of the event will be a mammoth dancing contest for cups donated by well known motion picture stars and a number of big vaudeville acts from the local houses. Tickets of admission for two will be $1.00. The proceeds of the entertainment will be used to defray the heavy expenses incurred by the Massachusetts League in the employment of counsel to fight unfavorable legislation last year. New England exhibitors should put forth every effort to make this event a success.

CINEMA EXHIBITORS BALL SATURDAY NIGHT.

Saturday night, October 31, is the date of the Bronx Cinema Exhibitors' ball, which will be held at Hunts Point Casino, 163d Street and Southern Boulevard. The grand march will be led by Mary Fuller and Tom Moore. There will be a great gathering of exhibitors and photoplayers on this occasion.

CLEVELAND LEAGUE MEMBERS ACTIVE.

The action taken by J. W. Binder, member of the National Board of Censorship, in coming to the assistance of Ohio exhibitors in a campaign to repeal the legislative act that created the legalized board of censors for this state, has imbued new energy among exchangemen and theater proprietors. As Mr. Binder explained in a recent talk to members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League Local No. 1, Cleveland, action must be secured direct from the people of the state, and a campaign to educate the people to the wrongs the theater proprietor suffers through too-much-censorship will be pursued.

Cleveland exhibitors are leading the movement for a repeal of the censorship act and will co-operate with Mr. Binder and the National Board. "It is ridiculous to believe that the Ohio board of three members can accomplish the same work and pass upon the same number of films with fairness and understanding as the National Board, which has the assistance of more than 100 educators and ministers," said Mr. Binder.

At the last meeting of Cleveland exhibitors members of the local League resolutions were passed condemning in unqualified terms the incorporation and establishment by M. A. Neff, president of the Ohio League, Robert F. Wilson, Harry Vestal and others, of a magazine which they claim as the official organ of the exhibitors of Ohio. The resolutions demand that if President Neff and his associates continue this publication they resign from their official positions with the League and from the Ohio Board of Censors, of which both Wilson and Vestal are members. The resolutions were sent to all concerned, the manufacturers and trade publications.

KANSAS LEAGUE CONVENTION.

The Kansas Branch of the Moving Picture Exhibitor's League of America, held its annual meeting in Kansas City, Kan., October 6 and 7. The first day there was no business done, because the exchange managers of Kansas City were busy meeting with the Board of Public Welfare in regard to the censorship of films, and because Marion E. Pearce, President of the league, did not arrive. However, the members got together on the 7th, in the rooms of the Kansas City Mercantile Club, and had a very satisfactory meeting.

It was decided to eliminate any initiation fees, and to reduce the dues to fifty cents a month. The meeting also went on record as favoring uniform fire protection, and an elimination of a large amount of the melodrama which is now being turned out.

The new officers elected were National Vice-President, Fred Savage, Hutchinson, Kan.; President of Kansas Branch, W. B. Moore, Galena, Kan.; 1st Vice-President, E. E. Frazier, Pittsburg, Kan.; 2d Vice-President, Howard Dull, Augusta, Kan.; Secretary, P. J. Concannon, Emporia, Kan.; Treasurer, W. H. Willy, Mulberry, Kan.; Sergeant-at-arms, Roy Bingston, Linsburg, Kan.

It was decided that the next meeting will be held at Emporia, Kan.

WASHINGTON CITY LEAGUE ELECTS OFFICERS.

Dr. William P. Herbst has been re-elected to the presidency of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia. Other officers are Ira LaMotte, first vice-president; M. Davis, second vice-president; Fulton Brylawski, secretary; Harry Crandall, treasurer; board of directors, Joseph Morgan, Thomas M. Eastwood and Victor Stonesifer, in addition to the above-named officers.

Dr. Herbst and Mr. Brylawski are receiving the thanks of the local exhibitors for the good work done by them while the war tax measure was pending in Congress, it having been mainly through their efforts that the Senate adopted a scale of tax rates and the House of Representatives receded from the first proposal to assess a flat rate of $100 upon each theater, regardless of the seating capacity. Immediately upon being informed that such a measure as this was pending, Dr. Herbst got in touch with Mr. Brylawski, and from that time until the actual passage of the bill they kept hard at work and were successful in the end of effecting the compromise noted.

GARY WILL OUTCENSOR CHICAGO.

The first thing William Forbis, acting chief of police in Gary, Ind., did when appointed film censor was to put a ban on all films showing up "bonehead" plays by the police, or any sort of picture that might win admiration for a character in any criminal act. The Chicago O K is not enough in Gary. Forbis' O K must be added.

TERRE HAUTE'S NEW THEATER.

Maurice Less Building Big Picture House—Scheduled to Open November 1—Will Cost $100,000.

WITH the granting of a charter by the Secretary of the State of Indiana to the American Theater Company, of Terre Haute, a new picture house concern whose mission it is to build and operate the American theater in that city was given birth. The incorporators of the company are Maurice Less, his wife, Lela, and Sig Uffenheimer, of Terre Haute. The new structure will bear the name of the American. It is now in course of construction and when completed will cost about $100,000. It will be situated in Wabash avenue.

The building will have a frontage of 50 feet on Wabash avenue and will be 162 feet deep. It will be two stories in height. The plans call for a house as near fireproof as it is possible to build one, and it will contain a large number of exits. On the second floor there will be a woman's retiring room and a children's room, while the smoking room for men will be found in the basement. The lobby will be 22 feet deep and will lead into a foyer 10 feet deep by 45 feet long. Studded with over 500 incandescent globes and suspended over the main entrance will be a beautiful marquee. The sidewalk for the entire frontage will be of marble and will extend for the full width of the walk. The seating capacity will be 1,050. In front of the balcony and conveniently situated on the parquet floor there will be fifty loge boxes. The seats in the loges will be individual cane chairs, while the rest of the seats will be upholstered in leather.

The interior will be profusely lighted and fittingly arranged with fancy and decorated chandeliers containing clusters of globes which will be lighted with the theater's own electric plant. The ceiling and the walls will be ornamentally decorated. Beneath the screen, which will be 14½ feet by 18½ feet, will be found the orchestra pit. It is the intention of Mr. Less to have an eight or ten-piece orchestra. The work on the big theater is being rushed so that it may be opened on schedule time—November 1.

FINE ADDITION TO BRONX THEATERS.

THE Elsmere, newest of Upper East Side theaters, which has its formal opening on Wednesday evening, September 30, is proving one of the most popular in the Bronx section of New York City. I. Irving Cohn, who has had considerable experience in the theatrical line, is in charge and through his untiring efforts has built up a large business. The Elsmere is one of the largest theaters in the Bronx, having a seating capacity of 1,600. It is located at Southern Boulevard, corner Elsmere Place, and that the management has selected well the location for this, their first theater in New York, appears evident.

The Elsmere is an especially well-constructed house for the comfort and safety of its patrons. The lobby is wide and well appointed and the walls are paneled with large beveled plate mirrors. Beautiful display frames are placed on each side of the lobby, allowing a generous display of pictures of coming and current attractions. The main floor, with a seating capacity of 1,000, is well sloped, the stage being in plain view of the entire audience. Large, comfortable seats, leather upholstered, add to the attractiveness. The same is true of the balcony.

The lighting is one of the features which attract immediate attention. The interior is finished in delicate old rose colors, all blending in fine harmony. Throughout the theater the same color scheme prevails and the same regard for the comfort and ease of the patrons has been maintained.

An extensive ventilation system has been installed. By means of a large electric pump, fresh air is forced into the theater through scores of holes in the floor and a large suction fan takes the impure air through the roof. The air changes completely every two minutes. The theater is of concrete construction, and there are no posts to obstruct the view. The cantilever system is in effect in support of the balcony. Equipped with every modern appliance the Elsmere Theater is one of the most up-to-date in the city for ease, comfort and safety.

sical numbers, Miss Wheaton and Mr. Murray are exponents of premier and modern dancing and an orchestra of nine pieces plays accompaniments for both pictures and the dancing and vocal numbers. The prices being ten cents to any seat in the afternoon, excepting Saturday, Sunday and holidays, and ten, fifteen and twenty-five cents in the evening.

PRESIDENT SIGNS WAR TAX BILL.

President Wilson, on Thursday, October 22, signed the war tax measure which is designed to provide the money necessary to offset the decrease in revenues brought about by the falling off of imports. The law as now enacted provides that "Proprietors of theaters, museums and concert halls, where a charge for admission is made, having a seating capacity of not more than 250, shall pay $25; having a seating capacity of more than 250 and not exceeding 500, shall pay $50; having a seating capacity exceeding 500 and not exceeding 800, shall pay $75; having a seating capacity of more than 800, shall pay $100. Every edifice used for the purpose of dramatic or operatic or other representations, plays or performances, for admission to which entrance money is received, not including halls or armories rented or used occasionally for concerts or theatrical representations, shall be regarded as a theater: Provided, That whenever any such edifice is under lease at the passage of this Act, the tax shall be paid by the lessee, unless otherwise stipulated between the parties to said lease."

Section 3 of this Act provides "that on and after November 1, 1914, special taxes shall be, and hereby are, imposed annually."

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"A PARTNER TO PROVIDENCE" (Lubin).

This adventure of Lord Cecil is quite melodramatic and emphasizes the courage of the quiet Englishman. He is providentially rescued from a railroad wreck and cared for by the cashier of a construction company and nursed by the young man's sweetheart. A few days later Cecil has the opportunity to discover and circumvent a clever robbery scheme, which probably would have wrecked the prospects and happiness of a very worthy couple. Arthur Johnson is again himself with his cool force of character and equal to a dangerous situation. Emmett Campbell Hall's stories of the "Beloved Adventurer" are a big success, due not only to the forceful writer, but the excellent resources of the Lubin studio and players.

" THE YELLOW STREAK" (Eclair).

A story entirely away from the usual line of Eclair productions is that called "The Yellow Streak" released Wednesday, Nov. 11, in two reels. The story, dealing with the prize ring, gives interesting glimpses into the life of a fighter and also brings into play the fire department of a large city. The featured principals are Richard Garrick, Irma Erle and Will Sheerer and a most realistic prize fight scene in the second reel gives an added zest to this Eclair production.

"PEG O' THE WILDS" (Imp).

You will consider this two-reel Imp drama unique when you see it. It has the vim, the dash, the vigor that is afforded but few plays of the mountains; but, above all, it is unique, odd in theme and treatment. It absorbs you, it thrills you and, while it is essentially a drama, the action is permeated with lively wit, delightful humor and sense of surprise at the turn fate sometimes takes in dealing with people.

Miss Violet Mersereau enacts the title role, and you will undoubtedly agree that it is the best thing she has done since she has been an Imp leading lady. She invests the role of the little wild girl with a gracious witchery, a subtle capriciousness that is at once rare and captivating. She is indeed "Peg o' the Wilds"; a mass of tangled, golden hair surrounds a face of innocent beauty; underneath the one piece dress there are lines which suggest a rugged, well developed body. Peg climbs trees and jumps streams with the same ease that she runs and laughs. Of society and men she knows nothing; her world has been the woods and her only companion her old, half-mad father. Her first encounter with "the man," her awakening to the meaning of love, her fight to save her old father from the law and the final reconciliation with her mother are all interesting developments of the play.

And we cannot pass on to the story without mentioning the sterling character actor who enacts the role of the Hermit, William Welsh. Without making the long whiskered hermit stagey, he gives an unusually vigorous impressive interpretation. The wild retreat of the old man through the woods, in the final scenes, the abject fear expressed in every line of his wrinkled old face and feeble body, the manner in which he bares his breast to the detective's gun, and last, but not least, his pathetic death, are all indicative of Mr. Welsh's exceptional ability and finish as an artist. For the most part the play has its locale in the mountains. Settings are picturesque and beautiful; the atmosphere is pleasing.

"THE MAN WHO COULD NOT LOSE" (Favorite Players).

"The Man Who Could Not Lose," the second release of the Favorite Players' Film Company, is the most original race-track story that has ever been presented. It is a distinct novelty in many ways, as it has none of the ancient theatrical tricks so often resorted to in dealing with stories of this kind. Carlyle Blackwell, the former Famous Players' star, is playing the leading role and is supported by a great cast of screen favorites. This story is by Richard Harding Davis, and was adapted for the screen by Robert A. Dillon.

"THE WOMAN WHO DARED" (Kleine).

An exciting race between an express train and a high-powered automobile is one of the sensational incidents in George Kleine's film production "The Woman Who Dared," a five-part subject scheduled for release through the various Kleine branch offices in the near future. For the making of these scenes the Kleine producers chartered a special train and secured the use of several miles of railway track. As the road beside the track is very rough the occupants of the automobile had several narrow escapes from death. The spectacle of the locomotive and its heavy train rocking on the tracks and the auto plunging along its narrow patch of gravel makes a highly thrilling and exciting scene.

The story centers about the theft of important military papers from the office of Count Bertrand after he had been drugged by a travelling circus promoter, who is a government spy. He is placed in jail and his wife, Countess Bertrand, immediately starts a fight for his freedom. Disguised as a circus rider she visits the old haunts of the spy, strikes up a flirtation with him, and, after a series of adventures, obtains possession of the valued papers. To make a flying trip into her own country is the next necessity and in the performance of this the story reaches an exciting climax.

"JACKSON'S WAY" (Lubin).

This picture was taken under the direction of Edgar Jones of the Lubin forces and is in three reels. Mr. Jones acts the principal part in the play and is ably assisted by Miss Louise Huff. The plot deals with the stirring times when Stonewall Jackson was holding the Federal forces in check despite overwhelming odds against him. The story abounds in heart interest, is well constructed and full of action. The central theme is the rivalry of two lovers. The picture is set in a scenic frame of rare splendor. It contains a series of scenes as unique as any that have been witnessed in a photoplay. These scenes are descriptive of hard fighting by night. Just what can be made of a night attack with clever photography is finely demonstrated in these scenes. The spectacle presented is really superb. One sees the attacking forces revealed in their advance by flashes of a big searchlight. The effect is wonderful. The figures of friend and foe are silhouetted against the dark sky as one flash after another illuminates the landscape. This battling in the dark by means of flashes is cleverly continued for some time. The effect on the spectator is extraordinary. In all the range of nocturnal kinematography nothing like these scenes was ever shown upon the screen. The scenario for this civil war picture was written by Emmett Campbell Hall.

"VENDETTA" NOVELS CAN BE OBTAINED.

The Kleine offices are in receipt of many requests from exhibitors who are about to play the Kleine five-part special, "Vendetta," as to where they can obtain copies of the novel at wholesale prices. For their information, Street & Smith, publishers, 79 Seventh avenue, New York, will supply paper-backed copies in 250 quantities at the rate of five cents apiece. These are stamped twenty-five cents apiece on the cover, which allows exhibitors to fix their own retail prices. The film is being booked through the special feature department of the General Film Company.

"Bert Barnett's Dad" Drops In

Paramount Man from Minneapolis Emphasizes the Value of Courtesy as an Asset in the Film Business.

THE staff of the Moving Picture World received a most pleasant call last week from "Bert Barnett's Dad." If that description to some lacks definiteness it is the best way we can express the identity of the caller as gained from such information as he saw fit to give us—that is, in that particuler respect. The Barnetts in a film way are known as the Famous Players Star Feature Film Service, with offices in Minneapolis. The Barnetts are in Wisconsin, Minnesota and North and South Dakota the Paramount Pictures. Barnett Senior says "We eat, drink and sleep Paramount."

Bert Barnett.

Mr. Barnett is a former New Yorker, but he lays stress on the "former." "Typical Westerners now, and we certainly do like the West. I have been in New York but two weeks, but I am anxious to get back. I am going out on the train this afternoon," said Mr. Barnett. The Western exchangeman was accompanied east by Thomas Saxe, the well-known progressive exhibitor of Minneapolis, the proprietor of the Alhambra and the Lyric. Not necessarily as a means to influence his business education, but merely in a measure to confirm solid convictions in the back of Mr. Saxe's head, the exchangeman took his companion and neighbor to the theater to see "It Pays to Advertise." Mr. Barnett is a believer in the best in theaters. He speaks of the Alhambra as a model house. He cites as an illustration of Mr. Saxe's attention to detail the fact that he has installed in the Alhambra a children's playroom of great size. There are many toys and quantities of sand to amuse the youngsters while their elders are enjoying the show.

Mr. Barnett is a firm believer in the quality of the product his concern distributes to four states. Without detracting from the output of others he praises his own. Also he is a strong advocate of the necessity of displaying courtesy in business dealings. In the picture industry there has not always been perfect consideration shown the exhibitor by the exchangeman or to the patron by the exhibitor. "The underlying, cardinal principle of success in the film business is courtesy," he said. "We find it practiced by the best theatrical managers, and there is no reason why exhibitors should do any different. I feel that some exhibitors have not realized the importance of paying the closest attention to the comfort of their patrons. The creation of atmosphere in a house is a wonderful factor. You see it here in your Strand, for instance. The value of music in the presentation of pictures can hardly be over-emphasized."

The Famous Players Star Feature Film Service publishes each week a four-page "Paramount Pickings," in which are included synopses of current Paramount subjects and items of interest to exhibitors using its service. When we asked Mr. Barnett if he had a photograph of himself "on him" he admitted he had not. "I'll tell you what I'll do," he said, "I'll send you one of Bert." So there you are: The picture is of Bert, not of Dad.

"FULCO" A HANDY CATALOGUE.

The E. E. Fulton Company, of 154 West Lake street, Chicago, has issued "Fulso," an "A to Z List No. 5." It is a comprehensive catalogue of machines, appliances and accessories involved in the presentation of moving pictures. The book contains 147 clearly printed pages, profusely illustrated. The Fulton Company modestly says: "We have endeavored to include practically every item needful to the moving picture exhibitor and to present the same in convenient form, size and arrangement." The Fulco Book amply justifies the statement.

"RIP VAN WINKLE" (Rolfe).

The picturization of his father's "Rip Van Winkle" which Thomas Jefferson has made for B. A. Rolfe Photo Plays, Inc., preserves in every way the atmosphere of the Joseph Jefferson production. At the same time it utilizes the resources of the most modern form of screen projection. The story itself is as standard as that of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

In order to preserve the original atmosphere of the old Joseph Jefferson "Rip Van Winkle," Thomas Jefferson made his scenario from the manuscript of his father. The elder Jefferson's "Rip Van Winkle," it will be remembered, was based upon the slight story in Washington Irving's Sketch Book.

While these two things were in Thomas Jefferson's mind, namely, the best utilization of the resources of the screen and the camera and the retaining of the atmosphere of the Joseph Jefferson play, Thomas Jefferson thought that both could be best obtained by going to the Catskills for his picturization.

Accordingly Thomas Jefferson took a company to a remote region of the Catskills, near the village of Palenville. Tourists constantly point out scenes near Palenville with which is associated the mythical character of "Rip Van Winkle."

Scene from "Rip Van Winkle" (Rolfe).

Here in the scenes of the original Rip, Jefferson enacted before the camera the story of the twenty-year sleeper. That he might enter into the spirit of his father's original production, the son wore Joseph Jefferson's costume. Even the gun he carries in the picturization belonged to his father. His gaiters were those of his grandfather, Joseph Jefferson the Third, who played a version of Rip for 14 years.

Thomas Jefferson in "Rip Van Winkle" is the Alco release of Nov. 9th.

"THE HOLDUP" (Lubin).

In this story the good Lord Cecil plays the role of a veritable hero, pitting himself against a band of desperadoes. On his way East he casually forms the acquaintance of an old miner, who carries his fortune in his pocket and is on his way to marry an old sweetheart, who has been waiting for him for forty years. The train is held up by robbers and the old miner's fortune is seized. Cecil cannot endure to see this. and with mad heroism attacks one of the robbers and possessing himself of his gun holds up the whole band until others come to the rescue. The old miner's money is recovered and Cecil has proved himself a hero of unusual nerve. Arthur Johnson in this story has done some excellent acting and been highly complimented by Mr. Hall, the author of the series.

EXCELSIOR PRODUCING "THE UNDER TRAIL."

The Excelsior Feature Film Co., Inc., at their studios in Lake Placid are now working on "The Under Trail," picturized from Anna Alice Chapin's book of the same name. Miss Chapin is the author of "The Eagle's Mate," in which Mary Pickford scored a tremendous success. "The Under Trail" is one of the prettiest romances ever written about the majestic Blue Ridge Mountains of Virginia, and with the splendid cast engaged by the Excelsior Company to interpret the characters of this story it is safe to predict that "The Under Trail" will be one of the best productions made in some time.

"THE SORCERESS" (Lubin).

Very romantic is the story told by Clay M. Greene and which has made one of the most beautiful pictures that the Lubin Company have ever released. It may be called a gypsy tale, inasmuch as it tells of the early life of a girl child consigned to a gypsy seeress by its mother, who rebels at her husband's orgies, which he is pleased to call Bohemia. The beautiful wife endures the atmosphere forced upon her until she sees her baby of six years mixing with painted women and offered a glass of wine to drink, hence the resolve to rather trust her to a wandering tribe than see her contaminated by the father's associates. The mother dies suddenly and fifteen years pass before the Seeress is able to restore the girl to her father and rightful position. The picture is staged by Colonel Joseph Smiley, who plays the leading role, assisted by Lilie Leslie, Justina Huff and an excellent cast.

ETHEL CLAYTON ONYX CLUB FAVORITE.

The Onyx Club, with headquarters at Denver and many branches in towns of Colorado and Arizona, is a society composed of moving picture fans. They publish a brochure devoted to gossip of the moving pictures and have invited a contest, voting the most popular player of the silent screen. The contest is yet young, but so far, Ethel Clayton, the beautiful Lubin leading lady, is well at the head, having to her credit 4445 votes. None of the members of the club have ever seen Miss Clayton; hence the voting has been inspired by the lady's work as seen upon the screen, which is a tribute to art rather than personal acquaintance or friendship.

INGRAHAM DIRECTS "MILLS OF THE GODS."

Under the direction of Lloyd Ingraham, Edna Maison, Bert Hadley, Joe King and others of the Powers company have left the Hollywood studios for Arrowhead Hot Springs, at the foot of the pine-clad San Bernardino range, there to stage "The Mills of the Gods," a two-reel drama of the Canadian woods.

The story itself is unique in plot, dealing with the deep love of a woodsman and the failure of the society butterfly to understand or appreciate such real affection. The price she pays for her heartless trifling with a real man's love and the dramatic way in which the climax is brought about are features that have never been attempted before by artists of the silent drama.

"THE STRAIGHT ROAD" (Famous Players).

"The Straight Road," conceded to be the master-work of the distinguished dramatist, Clyde Fitch, is to be introduced to the motion picture public through the Famous Players four-part production, released November 12. In the film version, Gladys Hanson, a talented young leading woman, admirably portrays the wonderful character of Moll O'Hara, the girl of the slums, who rises above the mire of her squalid and iniquitous environment to make one of the most tremendous sacrifices of which a woman's heart is capable.

Scene from "The Straight Road" (Famous Players).

"The Straight Road" is the drama of a submerged soul's conflict and triumph. Clyde Fitch knew the city and its various strata, and in "The Straight Road" he supplied a play that does not alone show the city's pavements, but that penetrates far beneath the surface, into the hidden soul of New York. Gladys Hanson is supported by a capable cast.

"THE BROKEN PROMISE" (Pathe).

This four-part Pathe, drama to be released through Eclectic, has the twofold merit of an excellent cast and most picturesque backgrounds. The scenes are laid in the fiord section of northern Europe and the salty flavor of the sea permeates the whole production. The splendid acting and beautiful rugged sea coast backgrounds make the picture one of real beauty.

Scene from "A Broken Promise" (Eclectic).

"THE CRIMSON WING" (Essanay).

"The Crimson Wing," one of the strongest novels written by Hobart Chatfield Chatfield-Taylor, Chicago and Washington society leader and literateur, is being dramatized by the Essanay company for the motion picture stage. This novel is so replete with dramatic incidents, with gorgeous settings and so full of human interest details of love and intrigue and war, that it lends itself peculiarly to the motion picture art. It has been predicted by critics that it will be one of the most stupendous as well as one of the most graphic pictures ever placed on the screen.

The drama will be produced by Essanay under the direct personal supervision of Mr. Chatfield-Taylor, who is an expert in dramatic art and who has had a wide experience in staging plays.

The author's social position, with his direct intimacy with international social customs, and his knowledge of the district in which the scenes are laid, insure the picture being realistic and true to the spirit of the story.

The scenes take place in the historic European battleground where the present war is in progress, on the border line of Germany and France. The scenes will be reproduced from actual photographs and descriptions of the country where the incidents of the story take place, and from homes and gardens in Chicago which are replicas of the places in Europe which are involved. Francis X. Bushman, the Essanay star, will have the leading role in the drama.

One of the principal scenes in the drama takes place in and about a famous French chateau. In Lake Forest there is a replica of this chateau where the scenes will be produced. Under the direction of Mr. Chatfield-Taylor, himself, these pictures will be made with a faithfulness to detail that cannot be surpassed. This is a four-reel picture and infinite care is being taken to plan a perfect production.

FILMS LLOYDS, INC.—MILES AND ABRAMS.

Now that Joseph R. Miles and Charles "Feature" Abrams have joined forces in the Films Lloyds, Inc., there is considerable activity in and about the office of that company on the tenth floor of the Candler Building, 220 West 42d street, New York. Increased office room has been secured and has been partitioned off for stock and projection rooms. Through the activity of the before mentioned individuals Flms Lloyds has become quite a center for out of town motion picture men—exchange men who want to buy good features and manufacturers who have pictures to sell—both can get value in full for their money and pictures at this growing film center.

In addition to their brokerage business Films Lloyds acts as agent for distant buyers throughout the world. Knowledge of the business and acquaintance with picturemen generally fits the principals of this company for the work.

TIPS FROM KINETOPHOTE.

THE K. C. Booking Co., Inc., a new firm in the field of booking big features, has established offices at 126 West 46th street, New York, with the Kinetophote Corporation, which occupies the second floor of the building there. Ira H. Simmons has already entered upon his duties as general manager of the new concern, having retired from the Montgomery-Simmons Film Service, Inc., in which he was the moving factor. The K. C. Booking Company will handle all of the production made or controlled by the Kinetophote.

Ira H. Simmons.

Great stress is to be laid on "The Coming Power," a timely three-reel feature dealing with political corruption from a new angle. Those who have seen the film predict a big run for it. The story is written by Catherine Carr, Chief Editor for the Kinetophote, from a script by Raymond C. Hill. The selection of the characters so that each will fit the part has been carefully done.

Lionel Adams, who starred in the stage version of "The Man of the Hour," has the leading male role and is supported by William Crimmins, recently of the "At Bay" company. Edith Luckett, leading woman with Chauncey Olcott, and Anna Rose, leading player in many features, divide the honors in the feminine contingent. Others in the cast are William Phillips and Leonard Grower.

FRANK B. SPURRIER IN TOWN.

Mr. Frank B. Spurrier, of the World Film Corporation's Washington office, paid a visit to this office on Monday, Oct. 26. One item of interest to the trade he related was that Baltimore exhibitors have at length come together on the ten-cent question. Baltimore has had the reputation of giving the best pictures for the least money and it has been a reputation that exhibitors of other places in the United States have not envied. Pictures are popular in Baltimore and it is a high-class picture city not only in attendance, but in quality of programs, in the management of the shows and in theaters. And everywhere the price of admission has been five cents. Hereafter ten cents will be charged on Saturdays, both at the down-town houses and the neighborhood theaters. This is the sensible thing from every viewpoint.

Notes of the Trade

Marie Hesperia, who won first prize as the most popular photoplayer in Europe, in the recent big contest just closed, is soon to be seen in an unusually strong four-part Kleine feature, entitled "Bartered Lives." The subject is a double exposure negative, in which Miss Hesperia shows to splendid advantage in the dual role of herself and her wayward sister. There are some very tense moments and some unique photographic feats in the famous "Bal Tabarin," Paris, showing this celebrated Bohemian resort at its gayest, and furnishes an interesting and entertaining transcript of night life in Paris.

The oil paintings shown in the first scene of the Alco release, Thomas Jefferson in "Rip Van Winkle," are the work of the late Joseph Jefferson. Then the standard and familiar story of Rip is unfolded in the son's mind, while he reads his father's manuscript.

Their spokesman, Hamilton S. Corwin, of the auditing department, informed Mr. Seely that a strike was imminent. Mr. Seely looked surprised. Then, acting as a walking delegate, Mr. Corwin reminded Mr. Seely that the president's birthday fell upon Saturday. The strike, he explained, was a handsome silver smoking set and he called it a strike because the matches set in a silver container were in evidence. President Seely thanked everyone concerned heartily, and then outlined some of the ideals of Alco, stating that the relation between him as president of the company and those who had remembered his birthday was one of hearty co-operation and friendship.

This photoplay of "When Broadway was a Trail" deals exclusively with conditions existing in what is now New York, in the years that mark the founding of New Amsterdam. Frequent references are visible to the period when the island was known as Manhatta and for contrast sake there is a brief vision of what the early settlers could have seen in 1614 had they had a vision that could carry them into 1914.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE coming of cooler weather has done much to boom the motion picture business in the District of Columbia and everywhere exhibitors are to be found with the smile that won't come off. It is expected that from now on business will be very good and individual exhibitors are doing their utmost to make their houses more popular with a view to obtaining a share of the patronage. It is estimated that more than fifty thousand people weekly attend the exhibitions given in the seventy houses in Washington.

Mary Pickford seems to be monopolizing quite a little of the limelight here just at present, for the little lady is one of the most popular of the photoplay actresses shown on the screen. The mere announcement that Mary Pickford reels are to be shown tends to fill the house to overflowing. Realizing this, the Empire theater, on H street, northeast, is announcing that it will show the Litle Mary Biograph reissues every day, beginning October 23, until the people of that section tire of them. It is to be expected under these conditions, that pretty near, if not all, of the reissues will be shown at this house during the season.

The exhibitors of Washington lost another good friend last week when C. L. Worthington severed his connection with the local office of the Eclectic Film Company to accept the position of manager of the Box Office Attractions in Philadelphia. He will, no doubt, be seen here frequently, for he will cover the territory comprising the District of Columbia, Pennsylvania, Delaware, New Jersey, Maryland and Virginia. Although it was only in the early part of June that he came here to open the Eclectic office in the Bank of Commerce & Savings Building, he has made a host of friends and he has the best wishes of all for his future success. He is succeeded in his position here by Herbert M. Osborn, who has been his assistant, and who was formerly with the General Film Company.

The Eastern Amusement Company has been granted a permit to make extensive repairs to its theater at 515 Eighth Street, Southeast, and it is estimated that the work will cost, $3,000.

F. W. Swett, representing the Nicholas Power Company, is informing local exhibitors and operators that the electrical inspection department of the District of Columbia will in future approve of the use of 110 volt motors on moving picture machines, the curent for their operation to be taken from the commercial lighting circuit in the booths.

Miss Knapp, who is in charge of the Scranton, Pa., branch of the Universal Film Company, was in Washington last week while on a two weeks' vacation.

Motion pictures of Germany, past and present, were shown last week at the clubhouse of one of the German societies for the benefit of the German widows and orphans, and a considerable amount of money, which will be turned over to the German Ambassador for transmission abroad, was realized. The pictures are said to have been taken by the German Moving Picture Company and to be authentic views of the Fatherland.

L. A. Getzler, of the Greater New York Film Rental Company, was a visitor in Washington during the week.

M. F. Staub is the new owner of the Scenic theater which was recently offered for sale at public auction. The purchase price was $2,500. The sale was made following the application of Victor H. Stonesifer for the appointment of receivers for the property, he stating that the business had been conducted by himself and two others, but that differences had recently arisen making it impossible for such joint management to continue. The theater has a seating capacity of 306 and enjoys a good business.

O. S. Goan, of the New York office of Warner's Features, Inc., made a flying trip to this city and to Baltimore last week. George T. Sharp, representing the Regent Theater Company, of Richmond, Va., and M. L. Hofheimer, of Richmond and Lynchburg, Va., were also seen at the exchanges. The latter reports that his two new theaters, one in each of the cities named, will soon be opened to the public. The one in Lynchburg has been named the "National" following a contest open to the public; that at Richmond, located at 460 Broad street, will be known as the "New Theater." This latter is one of the handsomest houses in the south. It has a terra cotta tiled front, richly ornamented. It is built along lines somewhat different to the usual, for the screen is built on the front wall, rather than on the rear, and thus all seats are front seats. The house is large and roomy, with a seating capacity of 460. There are three entrances at the front and several side and rear exits. The operating booth is equipped with a Powers' 6 A and a Simplex machine, both of which are motor driven.

The personnel of the Colonial Film Company, at 622 F Street, Northwest, have been kept extremely busy during the past few weeks and have just completed four reels taken of the Richmond, Va., state fair and one reel showing the convention of Catholic societies in Baltimore, Md. Another three-reel subject shows the activities of Congressman Charles Lieb, of Indiana, to be used in his campaign for re-election. He was photographed talking with the various well known House leaders and members of the Senate, and wending his weary way along the streets of the National Capitol on errands in the interests of his constituents. These films were made for exhibition in the motion picture houses located in Mr. Lieb's territory in Indiana.

Congressman Lieb is not the only one who has resorted to the use of motion pictures to further their political interests, for cameramen could be seen moving closely on the trail of other members of both the Senate and the House of Representatives. It is said that several hundred feet of film were taken for Senator Boies Penrose of Pennsylvania and for Congressman Hammond of Minnesota, who is running for the office of governor of that state.

Perhaps the most interesting work now being carried on by the Colonial Film Company is the taking of pictures illustrating the life of the deaf and dumb students at Gallaudet College, and 12,000 feet of film have already been secured. This company will soon begin the work of photographing the experts of the college delivering lectures in the sign language. These are to be sent to other similar schools, thus saving the expense of sending out lecturers.

MONTREAL.

THE Globe, Montreal's new moving picture theater, opened its doors October 15. Addresses were made by Acting Mayor Vaudelac and Alderman Blumenthal. The theater is considerably larger than one would imagine from an exterior view. It is a $150,000 house, and is absolutely fireproof and modern. It has a very high ceiling, a spacious gallery, and the seating capacity is a little over 1,000. The walls and ceiling are prettily frescoed and a unique concealed lighting arangement has been installed around the proscenium arch and beneath the gallery.

The opening show was a very creditable one, and included, in addition to photoplays, several vaudeville numbers. The theater is under the joint management of H. Quintus Brooks and H Vineberg. On the opening night a large floral horseshoe was presented to Mr. Brooks as he appeared on the stage to introduce the speakers.

The production of the Famous Players and Jesse L. Lasky film companies will be the future attractions on Mondays and Tuesdays at the Imperial. Herbert Lubin, who is well known to Montrealers generally, is the president and general manager, while Charles J. Handford is Montreal manager. The Toronto office is located at 245 Yonge street.

THE Elmore theater at 2212 Center avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., is being remodeled and improved. In the opening lecture of Newman's new series of travel talks in Carnegie Music Hall, Pittsburgh, Pa., last week he showed his audience the wonders of Egypt and the Nile. In this respect Newman's travelogue has been very greatly improved. His lecture amplified the pictured story of the message which ancient Egypt has handed down to the present generation.

Many of the pictures are familiar scenes of the traveler's recent excursion to the region of the Nile, and the personal touch adds interest to the reference to the history of the ancient temples he explores to his account of the whimsical wayfarers he meets. He not only elaborates upon the architecture and the archaeology of ancient Egypt, but finds live topics in the manners and customs of the present inhabitants—natives and tourists—and points out the wonderful progress made as a result of the British administration of the Egyptian government. Many of the motion pictures are done in colors, which enables the lecturer faithfully to reproduce the varied hues of the native costume as well as to preserve the awful monotony of the sun-baked sand which everywhere permeates the torrid landscape. Mr. Newman had the encouragement of the large audience. This week he spoke on the Holyland. MANLEY.

Why Did June Run Away?

KENTUCKY.

MOTION picture exhibitors of Louisville and this part of the country have been enjoying fairly good business for the season, which has not been all that it might have been as to weather. Cooler weather is approaching, however, and improvement is expected in the near future. In Louisville the last week has seen the motion picture shows doing well, partly on account of good bills and partly on account of the fact that one of the burlesque houses has been closed, while a leading legitimate house had a week's run with a play that did not draw. Last Monday was "Tag Day" in Louisville when contributions were collected for the district nurse work of the local King's Daughters. One of the tag stations, all of which were well patronized, was located at the entrance of the Novelty theater and is reported to have done as well as any other of the stations, considering the limitations put on it.

Louis Dittmar of the Majestic and owner of the Arcadia dance hall, has announced a "Cotton Carnival" for the entire week at that hall. A special window has been prepared in which cotton is featured graphically with bales and cotton bolls, etc., and it is announced that in addition to an unusually interesting program each visitor during the six nights will receive free of charge a coupon calling for some useful and valuable gift of cotton fabrics or ornaments, the list including cotton blankets, cotton bolls, comforts, nainsooks, long cloths, towels, sheets and pilow cases, napkins, handkerchiefs and other articles. Mr. Dittmar was among the first of the local capitalists to pledge himself to buy a bale of cotton.

At the Walnut the seven-reel film "America" was the feature on the three feature days set aside by the company, and enjoyed a good patronage.

The second school children's program was put on Saturday, October 10, at the Mary Anderson theater in accordance with the announcement which was made some time ago, and the response of the mothers and their children was even greater than on the first occasion, when some 1,000 saw one or the other of the two shows. The program of this second "specially censored" exhibition included "The Declaration of Independence," "Wild Birds at Home," "The Birth of Flowers" and "Little Red Riding Hood." The Parent-Teacher League, which is to be asked to endorse the movement, has not yet met nor has it named the board of censors which will be charged with selecting pictures that are suitable for children and which have educational values.

The Board of Education of Louisville, it is given out, will soon make purchases of apparatus for exhibiting educational films at meetings of the Parent-Teacher Associations and in the public schools. This work is to be inaugurated at the Girls' High School, where preparations are being made for the necessary screen and for the operator's booth. At the instance of the Board motion pictures have just been taken of the Audubon Open-Air School, the pre-vocational school, the domestic science department, the lunchroom and other features of the Girls' High School and of various other school phases. These will be shown for a time in Louisville and then, it is said, will be available elsewhere.

Louisville people recently had an opportunity to see themselves as others saw them, when the local Real Estate Exchange put on at the Crystal theater on Market street the film that was shown while the National Association of Real Estate Exchanges was in convention in Pittsburgh. These pictures reproduced street scenes, views of parks, public buildings, etc., and are declared to have done Louisville justice. They will be shown elsewhere in convention cities when Louisville delegations are away attending conventions, especially when Louisville is seeking the next convention.

By an arrangement with the Westonian Airdome, weather proving suitable, the Aneas Club of Portland, a residence section of western Louisville, gave a benefit show on a recent Saturday night at which time a certain proportion of the profits were turned into the fund for a piano for the Portland branch of the Louisville Free Public Library. The attendance at the special show was excellent and a goodly sum was realized to be applied toward the purchase of the instrument.

Recognition of the educational value of motion pictures has been given by the authorities of the Kentucky State College at the University at Lexington. The instructors in the College of Mechanical and Electrical Engineering in the University have agreed that a motion picture outfit could be used to good advantage in illustrating many of the subjects taught. It is pointed out that a machine for projecting these pictures would be in a position to utilize the films which are made up and sent out by the large electrical and manufacturing concerns to illustrate their processes, etc. It is said that the outfit required will soon be purchased, an exhibition recently given having delighted the college officials.

In Paducah Joseph Desberger, manager of a moving picture theater, is one of the local leaders in the "buy a bale" of cotton movement, and it is displaying two bales of cotton which he has purchased before his show house. In this section of the country the "buy a bale" movement is very popular and evidence that the obligation has been honored constitute good advertisements.

From Mt. Olivet, Ky., comes the report, without names, however, that a commodious, modern motion picture theater is to be erected in that town in the spring with seating capacity sufficient to accommodate the largest crowds that can be expected there. The informant insists that the promoters of the project have sufficient capital to insure that the venture will be put through.

With a nightly change of program the Crystal Hall theater in Bardstown, Ky., leased from the Bardstown Furniture Company by the Crystal Amusement Company, has begun to operate it under the management of M. G. Sparks. In addition to the nightly exhibitions there will be Saturday afternoon programs.

Motion pictures, with some vaudeville turns, will be provided in the new moving picture house which Lucien Swan, of Danville, Ky., and Arthur Frank, of Somerset, are preparing to open in Somerset, Ky., in the near future. The building is being remodeled and an opening is proposed next week or so. It is planned to operate the two houses jointly, so that booking arrangements can be made for both at the same time. Further into the mountains than Somerset, at Whitesburg, S. T. Frazier is pushing work on a new picture house he expects to open in the near future.

What is described as one of the best equipped and most elaborately furnished motion picture theaters in the country for a town of the size it is located in, is the Dixie theater, which has just been opened in Mayfield, Ky. The latest improvements have been incorporated in the building by the management and two Simplex machines will be used. The theater seats 500 comfortably and the opening promised a successful career for the new house.

In Maysville, Ky., in the east-central part of the state, the management of the Gem theater has announced that it has exclusive rights to exhibit all Shubert and Brady releases and offers a program of some of the leasing films that will be shown from time to time during the season.

Scenes about the Odd Fellows home in Lexington, Ky., were taken on a thousand-foot reel a few days ago by J. S. Needham, of Cincinnati, the intention being to put the film on exhibition in various Lexington theaters as soon as possible. Twenty-three distinct scenes have been taken and many interesting pictures of the children are included.

In La Center, Ky., where H. H. Evans, president of the Commercial Club, is proprietor of the local moving picture house, Mr. Evans has begun extending the electric light plant he installed some time ago to supply light for his theater and for neighbors. It is the hope of Mr. Evans and people of the town that this venture will lead to a plant to supply the whole town.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

CINCINNATI.

A FULL week of rainy weather served to keep attendance at local houses down to a rather low point, in a good many instances, last week, although other exhibitors reported improving business, much better than had been experienced during the immediately preceding period of extremely warm weather. The downtown houses did especially well, the crowds on the streets, which appeared to be as large as usual, tending to take refuge within the hospitable doors of the photoplay theaters from the chilling rain without.

Especially timely, and therefore successful, was the Selig three-reel racing drama at the Family on last Friday, "Garrison's Finish." Cincinnati race-goers, whose name is legion, were eagerly looking forward to the opening on Monday of the fall meeting at the famous Latonia course across the river, and were ready to take a look at anything like racing, even in the shape of motion pictures. Manager Lipson states that business has been holding up nicely for him, and he looks for a fine winter season.

The Eclectic Film Company's Cincinnati office put over a few days ago one of the most substantial deals which has been reported recently by any of the film offices, involving the use by the Hippodrome, the big new house at Columbus, of the entire output of the Eclectic. Manager S. P. Hetteberg and A. Klotz, traveling representative of the Eclectic in Ohio, put over the deal. The Pastime theater, which is controlled by the same management as the Hippodrome, will also use the entire Eclectic service. Mr. Klotz, who has heretofore been a resident of Toledo, has moved to Cincinnati, in order that his business headquarters and his home may coincide.

Edwin T. Bernardi, one of the pioneer moving picture exhibitors of Cincinnati, and one of the most largely interested, has transferred his interests in the Colonial to his partner, Thomas A. Reilly, preparatory to his departure for San Francisco, where he will operate a concession at the Exposition. Besides his half-interest in the Colonial, Mr. Bernardi is interested in the Fifth avenue, the Hippodrome, the Gaiety and Dreamland. He was the owner of the Phoenix, at 147-149 West Fifth street, which was probably the very first motion picture house in the city, and was later interested in the Southern Film Exchange, the National theater and the United States Amusement Company. Mr. Bernardi will leave for the Coast about January 1, devoting his time in the interim to getting his numerous interests here in shape to leave, and taking an active part in the management of the Fifth Avenue theater.

The number of exchanges in Cincinnati, representing various interests, continues to grow, giving every indication of reaching imposing numbers if all of the old ones stick and the numerous projected new ones make good. Reports now are that two more will be added to the list within a very short time. One of these, it is understood, will be a booking office for "Paramount Pictures," which are now handled for this territory through the Pittsburgh office. Business with the Paramount organization has been so good in this section that Floyd M. Brockell, the Chicago representative of the syndicate, who is well known to Cincinnati exhibitors, looked the field over last week with a view to determining the advisability of opening a branch. The other new exchange projected is that which will handle the booking of "Johnson's Journeys," E. G. Eichenlaub having practically concluded arrangements for this office. Herbert Lawrence, of Chillicothe, O., will be in charge of the latter office, it is understood.

For several days last week the Mutual Film Corporation's offices were in a state of upheaval, due to the throes of moving from its rather cramped quarters on Opera place to the roomy quarters vacated by the General Film Company at 111 East Seventh street. The new offices of the Mutual are double the size of the old, and Manager Hite is immensely pleased with the additional elbow room afforded, with correspondingly larger working space for all departments.

As usual, the big opening of the Latonia Jockey Club's fall race meeting, which took place on October 19, was a great day for the motion picture photographers, who seldom find more satisfactory opportunity to get some thrilling views. Several races were photographed, showing start and finish, and the crowd which filled the stand and grounds also came in for its share of attention. The thousands who took in the sport will now have an opportunity of reviewing the opening day's pleasure when the pictures are shown around town, as they will be.

Manager Clay E. Brehm, of the local office of the World Feature Film Company, has been somewhat bothered lately by an extremely sore thumb, a slight injury to the member having resulted in blood-poisoning. However, Mr. Brehm has gamely stuck to business, being seen at the office and around among the exhibitors regularly.

The Miami Feature Film Company, the only producing company located in Cincinnati, distributed prints of its first feature last week among local exhibitors, "The Lost Child" being the name of the production. William B. Stratton, manager of the Park theater, one of the popular local photoplay houses, is secretary of the company, and is very optimistic concerning the future of the organization. He declares that the local atmosphere is not too foggy for good photography, pointing to the first production in evidence of his contention, and says that the company will produce regularly. The actors are all local people, members of Cincinnati dramatic organizations. Mr. Stratton announces that the company is in the market for three-reel dramas and one-reel comedies for production.

The new Wilson Avenue theater, which was opened in Youngstown, O., last week, is one of the most modern in the city, and bids fair to be the most popular, as its owner and manager, Thomas McVey, is already a well-known figure in the city. An unusual feature about the new house is that its owner built it himself, being a brick and stone contractor. The building is of fireproof construction, with a seating capacity of four hundred. The opening was well advertised, Mr. McVey adopting an idea which has been carried out with success in similar instances, using a double-page advertisement in Youngstown papers, in which all of the material men and contractors who had anything to do with the building had space, the theater itself using the central portion of the big spread. Shows will run continuously from 5 p. m. to 10.30 p. m., except on Saturdays and Sundays, when matinee performances beginning at 12 o'clock will be given as well.

The Orpheum, of Urbana, has made arrangements for the presentation of two Renfax features a week within the near future. One reel of a thousand feet, giving one or two subjects, will be shown at each performance, with a speaking device so arranged as to produce the effect of living actors. The Renfax organization has booked a number of theaters in this section lately, interest in "speaking pictures" being considerable.

The film exchanges have been busy getting used to the new regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission regarding the shipment of films, which went into effect a short time ago. While the more stringent regulations now enforced are a little troublesome, exchange men realize their necessity, and are complying without demur.

CASEY.

ILLINOIS.

LOVING picture operators in Peoria are to a certain extent in favor of giving only a four-reel show for five cents. Their inclination is due to a loyal interest in the affairs of the managers, as they do not believe six or seven reels for five cents is a profitable proposition. Aside from that it makes no difference to them how many reels are run. Therefore when a Peoria paper published a story to the effect that the new agreement with the operators would provide that where union operators were employed only four reels or three reels and a song could be run for five cents something was started. The story said that no trouble was anticipated except at Felix Greenberg's Lyceum theater, which gives a long show. This was denied the next day by Secretary Hervey Mills of the operators' local, who said that the Lyceum was treating the union fairly and that there would be no discrimination against it.

A. building or for some other purpose.

TENNESSEE.

INTEREST among the Tennessee motion picture exhibitors centers at this time about Chattanooga, where for the first time in months the motion picture theaters were permitted to remain open last Sunday. This, however, was only for a special purpose and for one day, and the exhibitions were confined to religious and labor films, even then over protests of certain of the ministers of the city. The proceeds of the houses were applied to the fund being raised in Chattanooga to build a Labor Temple. Union employes of the theaters supplied their services free, the electric current was supplied free, musicians donated their services and a sum of considerable proportions was raised. Permission was given by the city commission some time before the day set, and good attendances were on hand at all of the houses which opened on that day.

Contracts for construction work on the studio and laboratory for the Photoplay Library Corporation will be let, it is announced, on the return of Lester Park, president of the corporation, from Atlanta, where he has been for some time arranging for removal of the equipment to Chattanooga. Altogether about ten acres will be required, it is stated, for the activities of the company and the sites are said to have been arranged for. Byron Park, member of the company, is quoted as saying that in all his twelve years' experience he had never seen a city as nearly ideal for a motion picture studio as is Chattanooga. One of the reasons why it is so desirable is on account of the numerous Civil War battlegrounds which surround the city. Signal Mountain will probably furnish the site for the plant, but the work of the corporation will include also Lookout Mountain and the country along the Tennessee river between Chattanooga and the power plant. Mr. Park says that so far as he has been able to observe, atmospheric conditions are all they ought to be to supply the right ingredients for manufacturing motion pictures. Mr. Park has been in communication for some time with a number of well-known photoplay stars and it is said that a first-rate company of players is assured. Offices have been established in the James building.

Work has been under way for some days in preparation of the Chattanooga and vicinity sections of the 20,000 feet of films which will be shown in the Tennessee building at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco. Otto C. Gilmore, of the Bon Ray Film Company, New York, is taking the pictures and has completed the several hundred feet of film which will show the power plant of the Tennessee Power Company on the Ocoee river not far from here Another 2,000 feet of the film will display pictures of the towns which are supplied with the company's service. Aside from that numbers of the railroads of the Chattanooga section of the state will use portions of the films, and there will be scenes aplenty of the battlegrounds thereabouts. Special efforts are being made to provide a great variety of the scenes in Tennessee so that there will be no monotony in the pictures at the exposition. They will be shown in the Tennessee building, which is to be a replica of the Hermitage, the home of Andrew Jackson.

Another picture company is looking for a home on Lookout Mountain, according to C. W. Howard, manager and industrial director of the Chattanooga Chamber of Commerce. As is the case with the Photoplay Library Corporation it is expected that headquarters for the concern will be in the James building.

The National Photoplay Theaters Company, which it is rumored will consolidate a number of the motion picture theaters of Memphis, has incorporated there with an authorized capital of $100,000. I. P. Good, Clement MacMahon, H. T. Moguis, A. C. Jones and R. T. Crofford are the incorporators. GEORGE.

OHIO.

BOB MANCHESTER, a burlesque leader, in forsaking that line of the amusement business for the motion picture field, has recorded an unqualified success at his new theater in Painesville, O The house has been in operation several months and plays to capacity daily. Mr. Manchester built the theater at an expense of nearly $100,000 It is conceded to be one of the finest playhouses between New York and Chicago and has a seating capacity of slightly more than 1,000. Five nights a week Mr. Manchester runs five reels of pictures, with only one show each evening. On the sixth night he puts in a big road show by way of variety.

The moving picture theater car, which General Safety Agent Marcus A. Dow established for the New York Central Lines in its "Safety First" campaign, is expected in Cleveland and along the route of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern soon. In inaugurating this innovation it was Mr. Dow's idea that a safety lesson, clothed in a film romance, is brought sharply to the mind of the railroad employe and its moral more apt to be followed Other railroads, including the Burlington, Santa Fe and Lackawanna, will follow out this idea in their safety campaigns.

For what is said to be the first time in history the governor of a state and his entire legislature participated in a photoplay when Director Stuart Paton and a company at Columbus recently staged "Of and for the People." It is a picture in which the benefits of the workmen's compensation law is visualized. Governor Cox and the senators went through the action before the camera man and under Mr. Paton's direction.

Personal liberty advocates of Ohio are using the moving picture screen in their campaign against prohibition, as proposed in a constitutional amendment. Their slides are flashed in a number of Cleveland theaters and elsewhere the fight appears most intense.

C. G. Thompson, representative of the Universal film service and manager of the Victor Film Co. in Cleveland, is the promoter of a string of theaters which will bear out a new idea in theater operation. The towns to be represented in the new combination are Cleveland, Elyria, Lorain, Cincinnati, Youngstown, Springfield, Akron, Canton, Lima, Toledo, Sidney, Piqua and Troy. A service entirely foreign from anything in the service line yet attempted will be put into Thompson's theaters. Orchestras playing musical numbers to fit the pictures will also be installed. The music for each orchestra will be sent from Cleveland each week with the pictures. Cleveland will be the basic point for the direction of the theaters, and it is Mr. Thompson's idea that within three years he can plan a continuous circuit of picture houses throughout the east.

When A. A. Comey took charge of the Duchess theater in Cleveland recently and changed its policy from stock and variety to motion pictures he did so in the belief that the novelty he proposed would prove a winner. The receipts of the house have since vindicated him. The Duchess is playing to capacity audiences each night. Feature photoplays, first run in Cleveland, are booked and projected. A twelve-piece orchestra provides music during the entertainment and from time to time a vaudeville or musical act appears.

Manager George Stockton of the Nemo theater, Cleveland, is booking one big feature each week in addition to his regular program of late releases and has worked up the interest of his patrons in thiss manner. RARIDAN.

THE WIDOW'S MIGHT! (Nov. 10).—Jones loses his heart the moment he sees Gloria Gay, a dashing young widow. His nephew, Tom, introduces Jones to Gloria. The tailor promptly proposes to her. In a spirit of fun, Gloria informs Jones that the man she weds must woo her as the knights of old wooed their sweethearts. Invited to a lawn party given in honor of Gloria, Jones gets into all kinds of trouble. Matters come to a climax when he upsets Gloria and her aunt, Mrs. Hubbard, into a pond. The irate guests heave Jones into the water and he is compelled to flee for his life.

Exhausted by the exercise, Jones sits down to rest. Falling asleep, he dreams of an Apache dance which he had seen in a vaudeville performance a night or two previous. The idea which smites the tailor wakes him up. He decides to woo Gloria as the Apache wooed his sweetheart. Stealing back, Jones sees Gloria seated on the veranda. Grabbing her by the hair, he tosses the amazed widow about. Gloria however, gives Jones the surprise of his life. Turning upon the love-smitten tailor, she hits him so hard—and so often—that poor Jones believes it is raining fists. Attracted by the sound of the ruction, the guests hasten to the scene. They fall upon the luckless tailor. The police arrive just in time to save his life. Once in the clutches of the limbs of the law, Jones heaves a sigh of relief until he discovers that he is being taken to the lunatic asylum.

A MIDNIGHT TRAGEDY (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 11).—Dr. Warren, engaged to Marjory, gives the girl her freedom when his negligence brings about his dismissal from the hospital staff. Warren disappears. Despairing of ever hearing from him, Marjorie weds Priestman, an elderly scientist who has been blinded as the result of an accident.

Years later Warren and Marjory meet. Warren has won prominence as a bacteriologist. The old love springs up anew. Priestman senses what has occurred. Although at first filled with a desire for revenge, his love for Marjorie is so great that he resolves to make it possible for her to wed the man who has long had her heart.

A burglar enters the house. Priestman, contemplating suicide, rejects the idea, knowing it would ruin Marjory's life. The husband learns of the burglar's presence. He follows the thief, who, perceiving Priestman to be blind, will not shoot.

Priestman finally corners the burglar and deliberately fires his revolver in the air. Startled, the burglar shoots in what he thinks is self-defense. The bullet instantly kills the husband. Warren and Marjory rush into the house. The wife's suspicion that Priestman committed suicide vanishes when the police enter with his slayer. Neither she nor Warren ever knows of the husband's deliberate sacrifice.

HAM THE PIANO MOVER (Nov. 13).—Presented with a check by her adoring husband, Mrs. Newlywed buys a piano. Ham and Bud are ordered to deliver the instrument at the Newlywed residence. While returning home, Mrs. Newlywed encounters Bert Chasem, a flirt. By planting a blow on his jaw, the woman intimates that Bert's attentions are rather distasteful. Undaunted, the flirt follows Mrs. Newlywed and hides himself in her home.

Ham and Bud arrive with the piano. Bud, who is about four feet tall, does all the work, while Ham gives him his moral support and kind advice. Mrs. Newlywed learns of Bert's presence and gives Ham $5 to throw the man out. As luck would have it, Mr. Newlywed arrives home. Mistaking him for his victim, Ham promptly throws Newlywed down the steps.

Meanwhile, Bud tires of Ham's tyranny and, securing a gigantic sledge hammer, resolves upon revenge. Mr. Newlywed returns with a policeman and the tangle is unsnarled when Bert is discovered and captured. Ham heads for his place of business. He chances to pass the very spot where Bud lies in ambush. The next moment Ham sees more stars than ever were in the heavens. He counts them as he falls. His foe brought down to his own size, Bud sits astride Ham and pummels away for dear life.

HELEN'S SACRIFICE (The First Episode of "The Hazards of Helen" Nov. 14). Appointed night operator at Lone Point, Helen learns that the daughter of Benton the day operator, is critically ill. That night, Benton sits by his baby's bedside awaiting the crisis. When he reports for duty the following morning, Benton is exhausted. Receiving a message ordering him to sidetrack Freight No. 245 until the Fast Mail passes, Benton falls asleep before he can carry out his orders.

Her heart filled with pity, Helen relieves Benton several hours ahead of time. She reads the message the day operator has received, just after the freight passes. Mounting a horse, Helen takes a short cut which necessitates a leap from a fifty-foot cliff into a river and catches up with the freight. Dashing alongside the locomotive, Helen leans over, and, seizing hold of the hand-rail, pulls herself aboard. The freight is stopped just in time to avert a horrible wreck.

Report of the incident reaches headquarters. Knowing Benton cannot afford to lose his position, Helen assumes the blame for failure to sidetrack the freight. It costs the noble girl her position, but the thought of Benton's sick baby causes her to glory in her sacrifice. Helen's next adventure will be released Saturday, Nov. 21.

EDISON.

WITH SLIGHT VARIATIONS (Nov. 9).—When Bob Harding received a heritage of $50,000, he decided to see the world. Hurriedly writing a note to Evelyn, telling her that he would return in a year or so, he packed his grip and made a dash for a steamer. He was immediately marked as a "good thing" by the deck hands, and, as the steamer was passing an island, they proceeded to relieve him of his valuables, after which they tossed him overboard. Bob finally reached the island, after a long swim. At the time Evelyn received Bob's note, Captain Connors and the parson were about to have a long cruise. Realizing that her sweetheart would be away for some time, she prevailed upon her father to take her and the housekeeper with them. In due time they sighted an island and decided to go ashore. As fate would have it, it was the same island upon which Bob was stranded.

He had been there for quite a while when, one day, he found a trunk on the shore marked "Tesse le Bon—Theater." Breaking it open with a stone, he discovered it to be filled with female attire. He proceeded to replenish his rather depleted wardrobe, and, feeling somewhat lonesome, he manufactured a companion with the clothes in the trunk, by dressing up some sticks. It was shortly after this happening that Captain Connors and his party came ashore, and the real complications set in. Quite unknown to everyone, the island was inhabited by a tribe of cannibals, and the captain's party was quickly captured. Bob, in the meantime, had become aware of their presence on the island, so, taking the savages by surprise, he quickly routed them and the whole party sailed away in safety.

The farcical scenes between Bob and his "island beauty," the consternation of Captain Connors on being faced with the steaming kettle, the antics of the cannibals and the efforts of the parson to stay their murderous plan, all combine to make this film a roaring force from start to finish.

THE HERITAGE OF HAMILTON CLEEK (13th of the Chronicles of Cleek—Nov. 10).—Completely wrapped up in his wedding preparations, Cleek had allowed everything else to escape from his mind and had not even noted the news from Mauravania announcing the King's death. In the very midst of this the Apaches decided to deal one lasting blow at their natural enemy, and, having bribed the chauffeur to drive through a lonely road, they succeeded in abducting Miss Lorne as she was on her way to the city to make some final purchases before her wedding. The guests were assembling for the ceremony when Sir Horace Wyvern burst upon them, announcing that his niece had failed to return from the city.

Convinced that his old enemies were at the bottom of it, Cleek started immediately on the trail and traced the abductors to a deserted house. After confirming his suspicions, he telephoned to Superintendent Narkom, who quickly arrived on the scene with a force of detectives. Miss Lorne was rescued and the entire band of Apaches were captured and thrown into prison. Cleek returned to the house with his fiancee, and, just as the ceremony was finished, amid the congratulations of their friends, the Royal Councillor of the Court of Mauravania was announced. To the astonishment of the assembled guests, he proclaimed Cleek heir to the throne of Mauravania and urged him to return and accept the gift of a grateful people. Cleek came to a quick decision, informing the Royal Councillor that his Kingdom was in England, and that his newly-sworn allegiance to the queen of his heart would prevent him from taking advantage of the magnificent offer.

ANDY FALLS IN LOVE (12th of the Andy Series—Nov. 11).—It seemed hard to Andy that he had to begin every day with a lecture from his mother on the subject of his personal appearance, and so he was in a bad humor when he met his particular chum, Lanky. On the way to the office Lanky did all in his power to cheer him up, finally showing him the picture of a pretty girl. Under the picture was the name "Lizzie Weldon." Not being able to get Lanky's copy of the paper, Andy invested in a copy for himself, and feasted on the sight of the pretty face at odd moments during the day His mother became quite worried over him. His appetite was gone, but, more serious than ever, his antipathy for soap and water seemed to have disappeared, and once, on entering his room, she discovered him furiously blacking his shoes.

A week or so afterward, Andy came face to face with his affinity—a full-sized picture of her—adorning a billboard. Off he rushed to the theater, but, in spite of his every effort, he could not get by the door keeper at the stage entrance. Suddenly, struck with an idea, he ran to a florist's and asked for "a nickel's worth of American beauties." The florist's answer dampened his spirits, but not for long. As he was passing a garden he saw a lady busily weeding the flower beds. Seeing a chance of arriving at his original plan after all, Andy struck a bargain whereby he would weed the rest of the beds in exchange for a bouquet. Working with a will, he soon finished the job, and wandered off in triumph with a huge bouquet.

Slipping by the door keeper, he went into the theater and waited for his affinty to appear. Soon he had his chance. Presenting the bouquet and dropping on his knee, he declared his love for her, much to her delighted surprise. Just then her husband and grown son appeared on the scene and Andy, hardly knowing how to take this unexpected state of things, took his bouquet and slipped away.

A QUESTION OF IDENTITY (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 13).—At her death, Lady Barrington, whose dissolute habits had caused her to break with her husband, placed Robert, one of her twin sons, in the charge of Father Journet, who apprenticed him to old Jacques, the clock maker. Several years later, Robert, having fallen into bad habits, became associated with a band of anarchists and was chosen, by lot, to kill Chevalier de Lausan, the Minister of the Interior.

At the same time the Chevalier became incensed at the dissolute conduct of young de Brissac, and an open quarrel took place, in which the Chevalier forbade Claude to pay further attentions to his daughter, Mademoiselle Clarice. On issuing from the house, after the scene, the Chevalier was shot down on his very doorstep and the gendarmes arrived on the scene just as Claude came upon the body. Seeing him standing there with the revolver in his hand, they at once arrested him on the charge of murder. There was, however, a witness of the crime. Louis Norton, from her house across the street, saw the whole thing, but, to her horror, the culprit was the perfect image of Richard, her sweetheart. Realizing that young de Brissac was entirely innocent of the crime, she appealed to Richard to clear him. Richard, however, was completely puzzled by the whole thing and could do nothing.

Driven to desperation, Lois went to the Cardinal to appeal to him to save Claude and to ask for advice. After telling him what she had witnessed, she gave him a locket which had been given her by Richard. On opening the locket, the Cardinal was truck with the resemblance of the enclosed portrait with that in a locket given him by Lady Barrington several years before. Realizing that he held the threads of the mystery in his hands, the Cardinal took Lois with him and visited the shop of Old Jacques. Her recognition of the real culprit was immediate. On her accusation, the detectives attempted to take Robert in charge, but he broke away and escaped.

In the chase one of the detectives came face to face with Richard, and, arresting him, took him to the station, where the Cardinal and Lois awaited them. More complications were added by this last episode, when suddenly the other detective entered and announced the capture of Robert, who had been killed in resisting arrest.

The mystery of the twin brothers then came out and de Brissac and Richard were liberated, to the great joy of their respective sweethearts.

THE EVERLASTING TRIANGLE (Nov. 14).—The excitement in Thunder Valley was on the wars, and Philbin had about decided to shift to another scene, when he became embroiled in a gambling house quarrel, and when the lamps were relighted, he stood there with a smoking revolver in his hand, while across the table sprawled one of the gamblers, shot through the heart. Even though it was proven that the gambler had cheated, Philbin, knowing that he would have to leave the locality, rushed to Kate's cabin, and tried to persuade her to go

East with him. The fact that the girl might have thought enough of Santley to marry him had never occurred to Philbin, and he was astounded when she showed him her wedding ring, saying that they had been married that very day. Philbin returned East and the young coupel lived a quiet life, until one day, Santley decided to go on a long prospecting trip. It was just at this time that Philpin wrote Kate, painting glowing word pictures of the delights of the East. The loneliness of the mountains had begun to have its effect upon the girl and, in desperation, she answered, telling him to come for her.

In due time, Philbin arrived, and she left the cabin with him, after writing a farewell note to Santley, enclosing her wedding ring. They had only been gone a few hours when Santley returned unexpectedly to the cabin. Reading the note, he followed their trail, and discovered that they had taken the wrong one, which, instead of leading them to the railroad station, would carry them straight out on the desert. Step by step he followed them, finally arriving at their camp, and discovered them both asleep. Kate was the first to awaken under his concentrated gaze, and when their voices aroused Philbin, he opened his eyes only to find himself gazing into the muzzle of Santley's gun.

Vengeance was in Santley's heart. Of the three horses, he shot two and forced them to draw lots for the remaining one. Chance favored Kate, but she failed to reach the railway. Thirst and the desert caused Philbin's end, and Santley went before his Maker with the name of the woman he had loved upon his lips.

MISS TOMBOY AND FRECKLES (Nov. 9).—A veritable will o' the wisp, the daughter of Judge Moore is sometimes called "Tommie," on account of her tomboy habits. She is continually tormenting her staid older sister, the "duchess," and creates quite a disturbance when she falls out of a tree into a pool with her little friend, "Freckles," on account of leaning out too far trying to see who the handsome young man is with the duchess. He proves to be Frederick Barry, a young author and friend of the Judge's. He becomes a frequent visitor at the house, and the duchess endeavors to monopolize his attentions. She gets up an auto picnic, to which Freckles and "Tommie" are not invited. They manage to "hitch on behind" the car, however, steal the lunch and jump off. The duchess is wild at finding the lunch gone, and Berry goes back to look for it. He finds Tommie and Freckles enjoying it and cannot resist joining them. Later, Barry bravely attempts to rescue Tommie and Freckles from an overturned canoe, not knowing that both can swim like ducks and have already reached shore. "The "rescue" causes much laughter, but Tommie is awakened to the fact that she is falling in love with Barry. The climax comes when, at a barn dance, Tommie and Freckles, who were as usual, left out of the invitations, lean too far over the edge of the haymow and take a slide with a big pile of hay right into the midst of the dancers. Barry sends a sentimental note by Freckles to Tommie, she meets him at the appointed trysting place, and Freckles, watching the lovers, expresses his disgust at Tommie having became such a "softy."

THE SENATOR'S BROTHER (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 10).—Two brothers, Henry and Paul Zanes, are country lawyers. Paul is ambitious politically, while Henry is thoroughly satisfied to remain in his modest surroundings. Through a friend, Paul meets Dorothy, a country girl, and falls in love with her. They become engaged, but Paul defers telling his brother. Meantime, Henry receives an offer of a secretaryship from a Senator, but does not care for it, and offers it to his brother Paul. The position is for an unmarried man, and Paul decides to quietly marry Dorothy, but pretend to be a single man. He takes her to another town, and after the wedding, goes to Washington. Time passes, and neither she nor Henry hear from Paul. One day, Henry is called to the bedside of a dying woman, and to his horror, finds that she is Dorothy, his brother's wife. He cares for her baby girl, named Dorothy, and after her mother's death, disowns his brother. Fifteen years elapse and Henry has brought up Dorothy in ignorance of her parents. Paul has become a senator from his native state and married a wealthy society woman. He is in favor of a bill, which in reality, is a land-grab, and would rob farmers in Henry's section. A committee calls upon Henry and asks him to influence his brother against the bill. He goes to Washington with Dorothy and makes Paul promise to vote against the bill. Paul's vote proves the deciding one and the presence of Henry and Dorothy gives him strength to vote against it. Later, he tries to claim Dorothy as his daughter, but Henry tells him, "She is all I have and I'm going to keep her." Paul's wife deserts him, leaving him to the despairing thoughts of all he has lost and the dreary future ahead.

THE BRIDAL ATTIRE (Nov. 11).—While his bride-to-be is impatiently waiting, John, the groom, is having one mishap after another. He loses his collar button, rips his vest looking for it, and, being annoyed by the boys continually calling him up to make some joking remark, he disconnects the telephone. Mary and her father, with their attendants, leave for the church, but still the groom does not come, and all begin to get worried. They try to get him on the phone, with—of course, no results. Poor Mary finally says, "Father, take me home." All return to the house, where she becomes hysterical, and father rages at the groom. Meantime, John gets dressed and starts for the church. The auto has a blowout, but he steals rides on trucks, jumps trolley cars, and runs like mad, determined to arrive at the minister's under any circumstances. He gets there only to find the wedding party gone home. Just before John arrives at the house, breathless and almost a wreck, dragging the minister along with him, Mary and her father depart to their country home in their automobile. John and the minister then steal a motorcycle belonging to a policeman and dash off after the bride. The owner of the motorcycle picks up another policeman and they speed after John. After a thrilling chase, John leaps off his motorcycle onto the running board of Mary's car. The machine stops and the minister hastily explains matters. John appeases the two policemen, then John and Mary take no more chances, but are married right on the spot.

LOLA THE RAT (Nov. 12).—Carlo, the head of a gang of crooks, ill-treats and bullies his Italian waitress, Lola, nicknamed "The Rat." Dr. Chester, a young philanthropist-doctor, overhears Lola's cries when Carlo tries to force her to work when she is ill, and interferes. Finding the girl has a high fever, he has her sent to a hospital and, becoming suspicious of Carlo, he has the police watch him and his gang. Lola is very grateful to the young doctor, and gradually learns to love him. He does not notice this, and decides to interest his fiancee, Amy Thornton, in the girl. When Lola is convalescent, Chester introduces them, and Amy offers to find work for the Italian girl, but her secret jealousy prompts her to refuse. Lola goes back to the Italian quarters and obtains work in a laundry there. Meanwhile Carlo and his gang, being harrassed by the close surveillance of the police, plan revenge on Chester, whom they feel certain is the cause of their trouble. Lola happens to overhear them faking up a message for the doctor, saying, she (Lola) is very ill and needs him. She attempts to warn the doctor, but, realizing she will arrive too late, goes to police headquarters, instead, and obtains assistance. She leads the officers to the meeting place and there finds the gang threatening Chester with torture in order to force a huge ransom from him. As the police break in, Carlo shoots Lola before he is overpowered. The rest of the gang are arrested, and Chester released. He does all possible for the dying girl, but her wound proves fatal, and she dies happy in the knowledge that she has given her life for the man she loved.

THE ROCKY ROAD OF LOVE (Nov. 13).—In order to make the acquaintance of Simon Giggs, a bashful and nervous bachelor, Emmeline Burr, a spinster of independent means, drops her purse in a crowded street, and, knowing he is behind her, hopes he will pick it up and restore it to her. The scheme works finely, but unfortunately, a policeman sees him pick up the purse and arrests him. Emmeline agitatedly follows them and satisfactorily explains the affair. Giggs is released, and now that his acquaintance is made, she does not intend to let it drop, and invites him to call. He is greatly embarrassed and hurries home. She then decides to call on him. She finds he is a painter and decorator and a happy inspiration occurs to her. She tells him she wishes her home decorated and painted. He commences work at once, but gets nervous again and awkwardly knocks over a stepladder with rolls of paper on it, with the result that when it strikes Emmeline, she faints in his arms. He is completely unmanned. Other ludicrous and embarrassing incidents rapidly follow one another, ending up by Giggs, in declaring his passionate love, sweeping table-cloth, dishes, chafing-dish and all into Emmeline's lap. The alcohol lamp lands in the lace curtains, and the room is soon ablaze. The firemen arrive, but Giggs proves that, while he may be nervous, he is no coward. He rescues Emmeline and carries her safely down the fire escape. Both are soaking wet and soot-covered, but sit side by side on a garden seat, where Giggs finishes his proposal. With an ecstatic look upon her face, he receives her sweetly whispered "yes" and presses her to his heaving chest.

ANN THE BLACKSMITH (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 14).—After her father's death, Ann, with her brother, Eddie, carries on the blacksmith's business. Eddie has a weakness for liquor, of which Ann is aware and tries to guard against. Absolutely fearless and of a determined nature, she at one time enters the saloon and almost drags him out. The same evening, Eddie's thirst returns and he sneaks out and rejoins his companions. He remains until the closing hour and, stupefied from his evening's carouse, dozes on the porch outside. Shortly after midnight, the saloonkeeper is robbed by a couple of desperadoes. He is awakened by their knocking over a chair and Eddie is also aroused. The two robbers make their escape, and as Eddie rises to his feet, the proprietor, thinking him one of the thieves, fires at him. He rushes home, pursued by the proprietor. Ann tells them both she will settle the matter. Next morning the sheriff serves a warrant upon Eddie and takes him to jail. Ann starts out on the trail of the bandits and locates them in an isolated shack. At a favorable moment she seizes a revolver from one of the men and forces them towards the door. An unexpected diversion occurs, giving them an opportunity to wrest the gun away from her. She is strong as a lion, but they soon get the upper hand and a serious result is only avoided by the timely arrival of the sheriff. The rascals are led off to jail, Eddie is freed and the sheriff asks Ann if she will marry him. She assents and "Ann the blacksmith" becomes "Ann, the sheriff's wife."

SWEEDIE THE TROUBLE MAKER (Nov. 9).—Sweedie has two admirers, and is undecided as to which one she prefers to marry. Her parents are in favor of Fritz, a little fat German. Sweedie is then determined to wed the other suitor. Next day Sweedie's choice appears at her home disguised as an actor. Immediately her parents are all eyes for the actor and declare that he is the one man in the world for their daughter. The justice of peace is summoned, and, not until the ceremony has been performed, does the father discover that he has been deceived. A call is sent in for the police and when they arrive Sweedie shows her prowess as a battler in a free-for-all fight.

WITHIN THREE HUNDRED PAGES (Nov. 10).—A necklace belonging to Mrs. Stuyvsant is stolen from Lawyer Smirney's office. It was smuggled in from China years before. Chief Knox is notified and believes Smirney guilty when he finds a diagram in his pocket, and following it, finds a necklace. Ho Fing-Tang, a Chinaman, studying law in the office, is not suspected by Knox, but Spider, a newspaper reporter, believes differently. Ho Fing-Tang is injured and in a delirium keeps repeating "Huns 764." Spider goes to the office and from a book called "Hun's 129 Reports," he extracts the real necklace. The stones Knox found prove to be paste. Ho Fing-Tang hoped to lead the police to believe they had found the necklace, giving him time to return the real stones to his country, but was foiled by the crafty reporter.

THREE BOILED-DOWN FABLES (Nov. 11).—Harry Dunkinson and Gerda Holmes are the principals in "The Household Comedian," a fable showing how a young lady thought her sweetheart's line of Bunk was clever during their courtship, but after being hooked up for a year, it wasn't quite so funny. She then took a turn at being clever and let him pay $100 a week alimony.

"Why Essie's Friend Got the Fresh Air" is so true to life it makes it all the more laughable. Essie's friend is a clerk in a store, but spends most of his time at the 'phone gabbing with Essie. He got terribly sore when customers butted in on his social engagements. His boss got wise and canned him.

In "The Prevailing Craze," Wallace Beery and Charlotte Mineau are arrested while going at a mile a minute clip in Beery's car. They jolly the constable along and teach him to dance the latest steps. The result is that he pays them for his lesson instead of fining them.

SOPHIE AND THE MAN OF HER CHOICE (Nov. 12).—Slippery Slim and Sophie are deeply in love. Slim incurs the enmity of Hiram Clutts, Sophie's father, and Mustang Pete. They swear vengeance. Mustang writes a note to Slim, signing Sophie's name, asking him to meet her in a cemetery. Slim finds a band of men waiting clad in sheets. He flees and asks Sophie to save him. She puts him in a trunk and when Mustang arrives she makes eyes at him and gets him to carry the trunk up to the preacher's house for her. She then lets him out. He forces Mustang to get into the trunk and locks him in. Mustang yells. Hiram hears, and lets him out just in time for them to see Sophie and Slim coming out of the parsonage.

BRONCHO BILLY'S DECISION (Reg. in U. S. Patent Office—Nov. 14).—The division superintendent of the Montana Idaho R. R. finds it necessary to buy the property of an old settler in order to clear the right of way. The old man, with his daughter, has occupied the same cabin for years, and refuses to sell his holdings. The superintendent wires the general manager, who sends Broncho Billy, his assistant, with orders to get possession of the land at any cost. Broncho offers the old man an enormous amount, but is flatly refused. The daughter then leads Broncho into the yard, where he is shown the grave in which her mother has been laid to rest several years before. This is their reason for refusing to sell. Broncho's heart is touched and he wires to the company that he refuses to condemn a burying ground, also that he intends to stay a while.

abroad. Mrs. Oglivie has great social aspirations, and her one object in life is to have one of her daughters marry a man of royal birth. She receives a letter from a friend abroad, saying that Prince Francis of Fournia is leaving in a few days for America, and should Mrs. Ogilvie desire his honored presence for a week or so, to cable an invitation at once. She does so, and he accepts. A house party is planned for the Prince and all the fashionable people for miles around are invited. Great preparations are made for the gala affair.

Mrs. Ogilvie has three marriageable daughters, two of them follow her ideas along the line of marriage, while the third, Betty, is the better looking of the three, and thinks little of social victories and marrying into the aristocracy.

On the afternoon of the big opening, Mrs. Ogilvie almost dies of heart failure when she receives a telegram from the Prince, stating that he will be unable to attend the house party. About this time a tramp appears on the lawn at the Ogilvie home. A great commotion is caused when the servants try to eject him. Mr. and Mrs. Ogilvie come rushing into the yard. The tramp is young, well built and good looking, and in the first uproar, Mrs. Ogilvie hears him speak to the butler in French. She induces him to take the place of the absent Prince. The guests arrive and the "Prince" is the hit of the party. James Atteridge, a practically unknown member of the house party—in reality a crook—watches the "Prince" with suspicious eyes, as they both pay great attention to Betty. Atteridge discovers the "Prince's" real identity and it later gets to Betty's ears.

One night $100,000 worth of diamonds are stolen. The Ogilvies suspect the "Prince," but fear to expose him. Atteridge, the real thief, is seen while hiding the jewels by the "Prince," and in a fight to recover them, Atteridge is killed and the "Prince" wounded. While he is being attended by Betty, who has learned to love him, the Assistant Secretary of State is announced. Upon entering he immediately recognizes the supposedly hobo as the real Prince, for whom he has been searching for days. The Ogilvies are greatly shocked on learning his real identity, but he explains that he was seeking adventure, and is happy that he found the real Princess in Betty.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURER NO. 9—LORD CECIL PLAYS A PART (Nov. 9).—Having discovered that his supposedly worthless "Golden Hope" mining stock is worth a fortune, Lord Cecil hurries back to England to save his ancient country estate from seizure by his creditors. On board the steamer, Cecil's attention is drawn to Harry Ashton, a young man of attractive personality, but conceited manner, and to Ethel, his wife, a pretty and appealing girl. This young couple are on their wedding journey, which is also a business trip for Harry. Harry falls into the clutches of Marks and Badger, a couple of crooks, and is swindled out of his money. Half crazed with drink, the boy embezzles $10,000 entrusted to him by his employer, and acts in so brutal a manner to Ethel when she attempts to save him that the miserable girl attempts to throw herself over the rail. She is rescued by Cecil, to whom she tells the full story. Harry has lost all of the $10,000 and is crushed with remorse.

Cecil pledges Ethel his word that he will straighten out the tangle. He recovers the stolen money by out-cheating the swindlers, and returns it to Harry. Cecil soon realizes that the return of the money to Harry has only partially straightened up the affair. Ethel has lost all respect for her husband, though she still loves him, and Cecil knows that their only chance for future happiness is to force Harry to re-establish his manhood in Ethel's eyes. To this end he resolves upon a difficult part. Selecting an oportunity when he knows the act will be observed by Harry, he seizes the girl in his arms and kisses her passionately, despite her angry struggles. At Harry's furious interferences Cecil laughs, and as Cecil had hoped he would have the manhood to do, knocks Cecil down. Still playing his part, Cecil slinks away. The scheme is successful and Ethel goes happily to the arms of her husband, who no longer appears to her—or to himself—as a despicable weakling.

The crooks, thinking the $10,000 still in Cecil's possession, have determined to resort to desperate means to recover it, and armed with knife and blackjack steal into his stateroom. Cecil coolly gets the drop on them, disarms them, locks the door, throws his own revolver and their weapons into his trunk, and with grim joyousness prepares to solace himself, with his bare hands, for Harry's supinely accepted blow. Some time later he allows two battered wrecks to crawl from the stateroom. As Cecil stands in the center of his wrecked stateroom, his grim smile softens—a vision of Betty appears and with a look of tender pride presses a soft kiss upon his bruised cheek.

BUTT—ING IN (Nov. 10).—Brown does not like his cigar, and having plenty of money casts it away. Weary Nigger, who has no cigar and less money, seizes the butt. John Jinks, the cop, who is not allowed to spend any money buying cigars, sees a lost chance to secure the butt and gives Weary a lively chase. Weary is very unfortunate, for he encounters many obstacles to prevent him from enjoying the butt; but not so with John the cop, who captures Weary, secures the butt and smokes up to his heart's content.

A BARGAIN TABLE CLOTH (Nov. 10).—Sally Huffy, a slattern, needs a new table cloth, but her husband, Judson, a much-harassed man, declines to give her the money. He changes his mind, however, after he has spilled a pot of coffee in her lap. From her favorite window, overlooking Molly Hardin's back yard, Sally observes that Molly's table cloth is full of holes, which affords Sally much amusement, but causes Molly to hit her in the face with a piece of wet wash. Hardin, Molly's husband, then gives his wife the price of a new cloth. The women go to the same store, where, unknown to each other, each buys one of the two remaining cloths of the same pattern at reduced price.

Unfortunately, Listless Looey, a tramp, steals Sally's cloth, which he sells to a peddlar, who, in turn, sells it to Mrs. Doocey, wife of police Sergeant Doocey, the latter being present at the sale. After hunting for the missing cloth, Sally spies Molly hanging hers on the line in Molly's back yard. Believing it to be her own, Sally goes to get it. There is a mix-up, in which Huffy and Hardin join. The police arrest the bunch and bring them before Sergeant Doocey, who is horrified when he sees the cloth, believing it to be his wife's. Looey spies Mrs. Doocey's cloth on the line in her back yard and steals it, hoping to sell it to the peddlar again. But Mrs. Doocey gives chase, and the police arrest both Looey and the peddlar. They are taken to the station, where Doocey is hearing the Huffy-Hardin case. Matters are explained. The disgusted Doocey throws the cloths at the crowd, ordering them out. Looey is given ten years.

THE QUACK (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 11).—James MacDonald, familiarly known as "Slim Jim," who prefers to make a livelihood by stealth rather than by honest endeavor, leaves his wife and young son one evening, and with the assistance of a "pal" succeeds in fleecing a stranger at "Three Card Monte" for a considerable sum. The stranger reports his loss to the police and a lively chase follows, in which MacDonald by means of sliding down a rope from the top of a twelve-story building makes his escape. Later in a duel with a detective he kills the latter and becomes a fugitive with a price upon his head. His young wife and baby being dependent wholly upon the wages of the husband, are compelled to shift for themselves, and having to fight against the disgrace thrust upon them by the husband, are finally ejected from the scant quarters.

Ten years elapse. The baby now grown to a good-sized boy, the mother finds herself in a western city. James MacDonald, known during these years by various aliases, finally locates in a western city as Dr. Reed. He successfully compounds "Dr. Reed's Celebrated Universal Specific," and by advertising succeeds in building up a large business. It so transpires that his deserted wife and son locate in the same town. The boy is a consumptive and the mother is compelled to work in a "sweat shop" to earn expenses. MacDonald, alias Dr. Reed, has never been able to shake from his mind the thoughts of having deserted his young wife and child. In the "sweat shop" Mrs. MacDonald learns of the "famous" remedy exploited by Dr. Reed from one of the working girls. She immediately invests in a supply, and after a futile attempt to cure her son, who all the time grows worse, she writes to Dr. Reed, imploring him to aid in some way. As Dr. Reed is alighting from his automobile to enter a fashionable cafe one evening he meets his former wife and they recognize each other. He at once asks concerning his baby and is informed that he is almost dead of consumption. He takes Mrs. MacDonald in his car and hastens to the bedside, only to find that his own child has been a victim of his own "Quack Remedy."

IN THE HILLS OF KENTUCKY (Special—Two Parts—Nov 12).—John Schultz, with his son, Don, are camping in the Kentucky hills when their camp fire accidentally ignites an outcropping of coal in the cliff. They put out the fire and plan to get possession of the land before any one else discovers its value. Old Blazer Hoadley, a mountain "cracker," directs them to the owner, young Lafe Herron, who lives on the mountain with his pretty wife, Roxie. But Lafe and Roxie are too happy on the old place to sell and the plotters are baffled. To make matters worse, Old Blazer discovers the secret and they are compelled to bribe and engage him for a guide.

Balked in his first attempt, Schultz hatches a develish plot. He has noticed that Roxie was interested in Don and he proposes for Don to win her away from Lafe, so that Lafe will be willing to sell. Don's attentions excite such jealousy from Lafe that Roxie is angered and they quarrel. Matters get worse with the young couple, but one day Don exposes his purpose by kissing Roxie and she breaks with him. Lafe does not see this, however, and firmly believes that Roxie is drifting away from him. Roxie's brother, Bill, escapes from prison and strikes for the hills. He stumbles upon the Schultz camp, is captured by them and his identity disclosed. Then Schultz hatches another infernal plot. With Blazer's aid, they cleverly manage that Lafe, at a distance, shall see the meeting between Roxie and Bill, who is dressed in Don's clothes.

This apparent proof of his wife's unfaithfulness almost drives Lafe insane. He resolves to sell the place and leave the hills. At the Schultz camp he writes a note to Roxie telling her of his discovery and his resolve, and giving the note to Blazer to deliver, he goes with Schultz to a neighbor's, where they get a rig and start for town to fix up the deed. Blazer cannot resist the temptation to read the note, but he delivers it to Roxie. As he is leaving he peeps into the window and sees the grief-stricken wife reel to the bureau and take from a drawer a tiny baby garment and sob over it. Realizing the terrible tragedy he has helped to make, he rushes in and tells Roxie the story. Together they hitch up a horse and drive for town. Meanwhile, the prison officers find Bill and not only arrest him, but Don. They also start for town, and while these two parties are dashing along the mountain roads, Schultz and Lafe are in the lawyer's office closing the deal. Just as the lawyer is ready to make the exchange of deed and check between Lafe and Schultz, the door is opened and Blazer enters with Roxie and tears up the deed. Then he exposes the whole deal. Schultz leaves and down on the street walks into the prison officer's arms.

THE TRAP (Nov. 13).—Rita Hermanez, daughter of Gen. Hermanez, commandant of a Mexican military post, is loved by two men. One is Capt. Ramon Orizaba, an officer in her father's command; the other Charles Ross, a young American traveler. Orizaba, being ordered by Hermanez to escort a shipment of gold by pack train into the mountain, determines to put his love to the test before leaving on the journey. Rita repulses him and turns to Ross, confessing her love for the latter; but Rita's father, when Ross asks for the girl's hand, flies into a rage that his daughter should wish to marry a foreigner and tells Ross to leave town within twenty-four hours or be imprisoned.

Orizaba determined to seize for himself the gold entrusted to his care. He plots with the leader of a band of Mexican bandits and plans to betray his own men. By agreement he leads them into an ambush set by the bandits, where they are all killed but one, who escapes and carries back news of Orizaba's treachery. Ross is unwilling to give up Rita, whom he believes loves him, and next day secretly sends her a note asking her to elope with him. He entrusts the note to Rita's maid, who reads it, then delivers it, and betrays Rita and Ross to Gen. Hermanez. The latter, in a rage, calls an officer and directs him to watch the house, which Ross has appointed as a trysting place, and to arrest and imprison the man who meets Rita. Rita goes to keep the appointment.

Meanwhile Orizaba, conscious that the escape of the lone survivor has made him an outlaw, determines to seize the girl who scorned his love. He knows that the summer house is her favorite spot in her father's grounds and goes there to wait for her, but does not arrive until the officer and his men have secreted themselves to watch for the man who shall meet Gen Hermanez's daughter. Rita arrives at the summer house and Orizaba attempts to seize her. The soldiers rush from their hiding place, capture him and drag him off to prison. A moment later Ross arrives and escorts Rita to his automobile, which is waiting outside the grounds. In it they start for the border line. Hermanez, upon being informed that the man he wanted has been imprisoned, goes to the prison to gloat over him. He is thunderstruck when Orizaba, instead of Ross, is brought before him. Finding that his daughter has disappeared he sets out on horseback in pursuit accompanied by two soldiers, but Ross and Rita in the automobile outdistance them and Hermanez gives up the pursuit at the border line. Later, in the prison yard, before a stone wall facing a firing squad Orizaba atones for his treachery.

MAGAZINE COOKING (Nov. 14).—Ernest Forrest and Dolly, his wife, are a loving young couple. What Dolly does not know about housekeeping would fill several volumes, but she is a sweet young thing, and they have a good cook. The cook takes a holiday and Dolly, after reading one of the dainty menus in the columns of a lady's magazine, decides to prepare luncheon "all by herself." She starts in bravely to make flannel cakes out of flannel, and other dishes according to her own limited ideas of cookery, then sends a note to her husband telling him to be sure to come to lunch. Ernest rashly invites his employer to take lunch with him, but when Dolly's fearful and wonderful dishes are set before him the situation becomes serious. Fortunately the chief article of the list turns out to be a laughable surprise and the ludicrous aspect of the affair averts disaster for Ernest.

BEATING THE BURGLAR (Nov. 14).—Liza Sniggs, a country maid, is engaged to Hi, a rube. She flirts with Jerry, a burglar, who has rented a house in the neighborhood for a week's rest. Hi is angered at Liza for flirting and she breaks the engagement. Jerry observes Sniggs, Liza's wealthy and stingy father, counting his money out of a tin box, and Jerry immediately makes up his mind to marry Liza. Jerry and Liza meet and he asks her to go for a walk just as Hi comes up. Hi tries to make Liza give up Jerry, but the latter pushes Hi's face out of the way and walks off with Liza. He follows the two and observes Jerry propose. Liza accepts Jerry, who then presents her with a ring taken from a big hand full of them. The two then go to get Sniggs' consent to the marriage, and Hi watching through the window sees Sniggs agree to the wedding.

Hi then retires to his yard and saws off a big club with which to beat up Jerry. Armed with the club, Hi goes to call on Jerry, but finds he has gone. The door is open and Hi enters. Looking about the place he finds a closet full of wigs and clothing of all kinds. Looking out of the window Hi sees Jerry kissing Liza. Angered, he goes forth with his club, but is frightened off. Hi returns to Jerry's house and arrays himself in one of the dresses. He gets several kids to go with him to the minister's, where he meets Jerry and Liza and represents himself and the children as Jerry's wife and family. Old Sniggs in the meantime finds his cash box has been rifled. He calls a constable and goes after Jerry. They arrive at the minister's house, matters are explained, Jerry is arrested, and Liza marries Hi.

ALL FOR BUSINESS (Nov. 2).—The broker spends so much time at his business that his wife feels herself neglected and their child lacks a father's hand. A climax is reached one day when the child, disobeying his mother, injures himself fatally. The husband is stunned by the shock, and for a while treats his wife with consideration; but the cares of business enfold him again, and one day he locks himself in with the board of directors after promising to take her to visit the baby's grave. She comes to the office and is stopped by the confidential clerk. A messenger arrives, bringing word from the broker's secret partner that unless more margin is put up on their holdings the market will wipe them out. The wife takes the message, saying that she will deliver it; but outside the door of the directors' room she hesitates, resolves to teach him a lesson, and goes off. After the meeting of the directors is over, the husband gets a frantic telephone call from his partner, turns to the confidential clerk for confirmation, and, learning the truth, starts for home.

MASKS AND FACES (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 3).—Ernest Vane, infatuated by the famous actress, Peg Woffington, dallies around her until his wife despairs of ever seeing him again. Kitty Clive, an actress in Peg's company, is jealous of her success. Learning from Sir Charles Pomander, Vane's friend, that he is married, Kitty goes down to his home and, posing as a gypsy, reads the wife's fortune. "The one you love is in danger and needs you," she says. Mabel Vane hies her to London, arriving at Vane's house just as he is giving a party to Peg Woffington. Peg leaves in high dudgeon, laughing her way off so that Kitty's sneering eyes shall not see her heart is breaking—for she loves Vane. At the home of the artist Triplet, whither she goes to inspect her portrait, Peg faces her life's tragedy when Mabel follows her. The woman's struggle with her love and pride, the wife's piteous appeal for her husband, the false friend's dishonor, and the final triumph of a noble nature.

BUTTERFLIES AND ORANGE BLOSSOMS (Nov. 3).—A young bachelor, hunting butterflies in the South, is informed by his mother that a beautiful girl will soon visit his hotel. He moves elsewhere. The girl, seeking diversion, goes to the cabin of an old mammy who has done some laundry work for her, and in a spirit of fun takes home some washing for the old lady. On the way she falls in with the bachelor, and the acquaintance thus formed ripens into a love affair which progresses through many whimsical adventures.

A REGULAR RIP (Nov. 6).—A vaudeville team visit friends and find the good wife very unhappy because of her husband's habits. She has driven him from the house, and he, going hunting, falls asleep in the woods. Passing that way, the vaudeville performers see him asleep, and the copy of "Rip Van Winkle" which he has been reading suggests a plan that provokes laughter and cures "Rip" of his bad habits.

GETTING THE SACK (Nov. 6).—Susie's little sweetheart is spurned by her father and bullied by his two rivals, one of whom is father's choice. She writes Tom that she will elope with him, and that he must hide in the sack which he will find in the hallway of her home. Joe also gets a letter, directing him to carry off the sack, as Susie will be hidden in it. The entrance of two burglars arouses father. Joe, chased by the old man, reaches the minister's with his burden, and complications ensue.

THE DOLE OF DESTINY (Nov. 7).—The valley girl is spurned by her lover, Pitt, who seeks to make a good marriage with the planter's daughter. But she repulses him, for she loves a young neighbor. Pitt holds a mortgage on the young man's farm, and offers to cancel it if he will stand out of his way with the girl. The lover refuses angrily, and Pitt resolves to put him out of the way. But fate decrees otherwise.

THE TELLTALE KNIFE (Nov. 3).—Mabel Madden, a typical western girl, thrown upon her own resources, inherits a saloon from her father. She is somewhat infatuated with Tom Mason, against whom suspicions have been aroused of rustling cattle from the neighboring ranchmen. But she is also a great admirer of the intrepid sheriff, who posts in her bar-room an offer of a reward of $500 for the capture of the cattle rustlers.

Tom Mason is really a rustler and with his band makes depredations until one day two of them have a narrow escape from being caught in the act of branding a steer. Mabel has presented Tom with a knife, which he leaves behind when he runs away from the approaching range rider, who discovers them. The range rider gives the knife to the sheriff, who identifies Tom thereby. A pistol fight follows. Tom and his gang escape temporarily, only to be wiped out by the sheriff and his posse. It is a most vivid picture with a lot of shooting, real fighting, hard riding and love making. The sheriff wins Mabel and announces the saloon for sale.

"C. D." (Nov. 4).—This picture tells the story of Ralph Tillman, a clever United States Secret Service Agent and telegraph operator, who is instructed to report to the War Department. He is sent to General Sickles to become a Northern spy. He chooses Frank Lyons, another telegraph operator to accompany him. Before leaving Washington, he calls upon his fiancee, Vera Colby, and tells her of his perilous assignment.

In the South, Tillman meets Roxy, a beautiful waif, who understands telegraphy. She falls in love with him, but discovers that he is a Northern spy. She catches him telegraphing important news, covers him with her revolver and telegraphs to the Confederate camp that she has caught a spy. He tells her of his love in the North, and she permits him to escape. Tillman goes North to his sweetheart, finds her married, and returns South to bring love and happiness to Roxy.

NO WEDDING BELLS FOR HER (Nov. 6).—Maggie, the beautiful heiress, has several dollars in the bank, but keeps only small change in her purse. Gerald, her feverish lover, discovers that Gertie, who is Maggie's rival, carries as much as $2.00 about. He covets her wealth, and, renouncing his engagement to Maggie, becomes engaged to Gertie. Maggie, frantic with grief, turns on the gas to end her affliction, but Rupert, the villain, discovers her plight, goes to the gas house, turns off the gas and thereby saves her life by a narrow margin, because it was some distance to the gas house.

Gertie and Gerald become the parents of many "white hopes," but Gerald would like to lose them. He discovers Gertie giving the iceman a thousand dollars to pay for ice, and he believes her to be in love with him, and orders the pair from the house. Rupert, the villain, has conspired with Maggie to eliminate Gertie. Gerald agrees to marry Maggie if she and Rupert will get rid of his numerous offsprings and his wife. In the end, justice triumphs in true burlesque style.

THE RANGER'S ROMANCE (Nov. 10).—A Texas settler and his daughter, Sally, start on a journey in a prairie schooner after bidding farewell to Sally's mother and to Tom, the ranger, who is operating in the neighborhood on a lookout for cattle rustlers and illicit whiskey sellers. The great wagon is hauled out of the corral by a pair of spirited horses, while ranger Tom departs to take up the trail of a "bootlegger" who is reported to have been operating among the Indians thereabouts.

The prairie schooner pursues its way along the winding trail, while Sally familiarizes herself with the use of a repeating rifle. Ranger Tom locates the trail of the "bootlegger," follows it and discovers the object of his quest, wounded after a conict with renegade Indians who have seized his stock of whiskey. The Indians, maddened by drink, have sighted the prairie schooner and pursue it. They engage in a running fight which lasts until the wagon breaks down, knocking the settler unconscious, while Sally bravely fights the Indians with the rifle. She is taken a prisoner, carried off by the Indians, but ranger Tom follows, rescues her and the old story of love is told again when Tom wins his bride.

PEGGY, OF PRIMROSE LANE (Nov. 11).—Peggy Mayhew wants to become a great actress and goes to the city. She is a pretty Southern girl, beloved by Willis Howe, a young, Southern planter, but Peggy has been attracted by the glamour of the stage and will try her fortune in the city. She meets Maysie Twinkle, a flashy, overdressed, but good-hearted young soubrette, who becomes Peggy's friend.

At Sam Cominsky's vaudeville agency Peggy tries to obtain an engagement. Peggy does her "stunt" to the accompaniment of laughter and jeers from an audience of down-and-out actors. Maysie leads her away and she secures a chance to pose before Roger Gage, a famous artist. Her earnings are meagre and she takes a room in an attic, her neighbors being counterfeiters. Peggy becomes their unwitting tool and passes bad bills. The kind artist discovering Peggy's distress, telegraphs to Howe. Peggy is rescued from her misfortunes and she returns home to become Howe's bride and again to be the belle of Primrose Lane.

CUPID TURNS THE TABLES (Nov. 13).—Mr. Batch, being wealthy, is beset by scores of admiring women until he detests the sight of them. One day while strolling, he is captured by three girls and escapes only with the aid of Lydia Dodgem, a seamstress, who is driving past in a buggy and whose horse becomes frightened. Batch prefers to risk his life by stopping the runaway horse rather than remain with the girls.

Three friends of Batch—Tom, Dick and Harry—learn of his gallantry and when Lydia and the three girls call on Batch to thank him for his services, he jumps into bed and pretends to be ill. His cronies carry out the joke by calling in a doctor to whom they explain the conditions, and the doctor gravely tells Lydia and the girls that Batch requires careful attention. Lydia expresses a determination, to Batch's great horror to remain to nurse him through his illness. But Lydia discovers the joke, and Batch discovers that Lydia, who is really a pretty girl, has been disguised as an old maid. Of course, they fall in love.

THE FATAL NOTE (Nov. 14).—Tisdale and his lovely young wife are about to celebrate their fifth wedding anniversary. Tisdale discovers his wife passionately kissing a love letter and upon obtaining possession of it, reads: "Ten o'clock at the old elm," and signed "Your lover." Tisdale is frantic with jealousy. He writes a note to his wife telling her that he has discovered her infidelity. He finds her sleeping, ties the note to her bare foot and goes to the old elm to meet his rival, and engage him in mortal combat.

It is a dark night and raining. A stray mule has taken refuge under the old elm, and upon the approach of Tisdale moves away. Tisdale rushes after and fires his revolver at the dim shape. His wife having discovered the note arouses the servants, and goes in search of him. All is explained when she tells him that he himself wrote the love letter to her five years ago.

ROSEMARY, THAT'S FOR REMEMBRANCE (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 2).—Dorinda, a mountain girl, left alone by the death of her parents, is adopted by distant relatives, Mr. and Mrs. Greer. Mrs. Greer is not overjoyed by this addition to their family, because all her mother-love and affection is given to their only son, Harvey, just finishing a term at college. Shortly after Dorinda is taken into the family, Harvey returns home and becomes interested in the girl. Dorinda goes into the garden to gather some flowers, and Harvey finds her there. While arranging the flowers, he notes a sprig of Rosemary and asks her if she knows the ancient meaning of the word. She replies in the negative. So Harvey proceeds to bring out a volume of Shakespeare and turning to "Hamlet," reads the lines of Ophelia in the fourth act, quoting: "There's Rosemary, that's for remembrance, Pray love, remember."

Dorinda and Harvey become deeply interested in each other. A definite love affair, however, is averted. A former college friend obtains for Harvey an appointment as attache with a diplomatic representative. The departure of Harvey to Washington is a blow to Dorinda, who cannot bear to say good-bye, so she writes him a short note. Harvey takes from the flower garden a sprig of Rosemary, which he puts in a flower pot and leaves it at Dorinda's door as a parting remembrance. Dorinda cherishes the sprig of Rosemary.

Harvey becomes busy with his new duties and forgets his former sweetheart. One evening at an Embassay ball, he becomes attracted at the first sight of a beautiful girl—one of the guests. She is also interested in Harvey, but coyly avoids him, although she encourages him by dropping a blossom from her bouquet, feeling sure that he will take up the gage thus thrown down, for seeking a further acquaintance.

Little Dorinda is forgotten. The unknown coquette finally rewards Harvey with a smile, but shortly afterwards she leaves the Embassy ball and Harvey despairs of ever seeing her again. He returns home for a week-end visit with his family and at church Sunday morning is astounded and delighted to see the beauty of the Washington ball room in the congregation. Then he discovers that her name is Margaret, and that she is visiting her aristocratic relatives, the Pryors, who are neighbors of the Greers. General Pryor introduces Harvey to the beautiful unknown and invites him to call at their residence. Harvey is delighted and loses no time in furthering his acquaintance with Margaret. His infatuation is noticeable, especially to Dorinda, who becomes heartbroken and downcast.

A reception is given at the residence of the Pryor's one evening, and Dorinda, who has not been invited, enters the grounds and peering through the window, discovers Harvey upon his knees before Margaret, making an avowal of his love.

A short time after, while Margaret is in the woods sketching, she sees a picturesque old man taking a drink of water from an old-fashioned well. She proceeds to sketch him and when Harvey finds her there she shows him the sketch and asks him who that picturesque old man is. Harvey replies without shame, that it is his father. She is at first incredulous, but when she discovers that Harvey is manfully speaking the truth, her affection for him becomes lukewarm.

One night Margaret is left alone with the children in the Pryor residence, and one of the little ones become seriously ill. Not knowing whom to summon for help, she sends a note to Harvey, begging him to procure a doctor at once. Harvey shows the note to Dorinda, and asks her to help save the life of the child by going at once to the Pryor residence and giving such aid as she can administer until the arrival of the physician. She demurs at first, but finally rides off on horseback. On the way her steed is frightened by an automobile and she is thrown violently to the ground. When Harvey and the doctor arrive upon the scene in an automobile they find Dorinda unconscious, and carry her at once to the Pryor residence where she is restored to consciousness. Harvey is overcome by the accident and his heart at last tells him the truth. It is Dorinda whom he loves. Margaret finds them together and realizing the situation, resigns all claims to Harvey.

to aid her grandfather in his work and she finds it toilsome.

Josh Rawlins is a sailor on board the schooner, "Maid of the Mist," owned by his uncle, a crabbed old sea captain, whose savings accumulated by hard work, have been thriftily invested in the little craft. The schooner is engaged in carrying cargoes of gunpowder between a distant port and the little fishing village.

Josh hastens from his work after the schooner has been snugly berthed to the home of old Captain Melody to greet his sweetheart. He is dumfounded to discover that his embraces and affectionate phrases are repulsed by Neptuna, who has developed a peevish disposition since he went away. She tells him she is sick and tired of life in the fishing village, but that she will marry him only if he has money. Josh hopefully declares that he believes his uncle, Captain Cy Rawlins, will help them; so they go aboard the "Maid of the Mist" and Josh presents the subject to the old captain. Captain Cy derides his hopes and declares that Neptuna is a scheming girl without love and affection. Whereupon Neptuna stamps her foot and runs away. Josh has angry words with his uncle, and declines to sail with his crusty old uncle any more.

A short time after this Neptuna, while strolling on the beach, discovers a discarded vest washed up by the waves. She picks it up and to her unbounded astonishment and great joy, she discovers a $5 bill in one of its pockets. Hastening to the house she steals silently in, writes a brief note of farewell to Josh and makes her way swiftly to the railroad station. When Josh discovers the note and reads it, he finds that she has directed him not to seek for her "until your ship comes in."

Neptuna finds work in a laundry, but her inexperience and lack of skill render her subject to constant criticism and reproach. Weeks later Josh receives a message announcing the death of his uncle and the fact that he is now the owner of the "Maid of the Mist," which will sail shortly for Home-Port with her accustomed cargo of gunpowder.

The "Maid of the Mist" takes aboard her cargo of gunpowder at the wharf in the same city where Neptuna is laboriously toiling in the laundry. There is much excitement among the crew of the schooner when it is discovered that the rats are leaving the ship. This is a sign which invariably awakens the superstitions and fears of sailors. The "Maid of the Mist" crew go ashore in a body and determine that they will not sail in her again; but the captain follows them and after considerable argument they return to their duty.

Unfortunate Neptuna toils arduously in the laundry, but unskillfully scorches a shirt with a hot iron. The proprietor notes her lack of skill and discharges her. Out of employment and without friends, Neptuna wanders instinctively to the wharfs where she discovers the schooner "Maid of the Mist" all ready to sail. She steals aboard and conceals herself between decks, having supplied herself with sufficient provisions for the voyage. All goes well until the sailors are alarmed by a smell of smoke coming from the hold where the gunpowder is stored. They embark hastily in two small boats and row rapidly away from the doomed vessel as they expect her to blow up at any moment.

Neptuna is almost overcome by the smoke, but her good fortune has not forsaken her. A strong wind has raised a heavy sea and the schooner having broached to, and with all sails set because of no hand at the wheel, is overwhelmed by an enormous wave which bursts through the open hatches and puts out the fire. Neptuna makes her way to the main deck and discovers that the crew has deserted the schooner. With some knowledge of seamanship, she is not a skilled sailor and in search of some possible help she enters the captain's cabin. On the table she finds a newspaper on the first page of which is printed the announcement of the death of Captain Cy Rawlins and the inheritance of the schooner by Josh, her sweetheart.

Neptuna bravely puts her seamanship to the test, brings the schooner upon her course toward Home-Port and remains at the helm for twenty-four hours. She is sighted from the shore by Josh and her grandfather, who immediately put out in a boat to meet the vessel. They find Neptuna unconscious at her post of duty, but she is easily revived. She brought Josh's ship in herself and thereby furnished her own wedding dowry. Thus were the lovers happily reunited.

A CORRECTION.

The title of the Bison two-part release for October 31 has been changed from "A Daughter of the Redskins" to "A Redskin's Reckoning." A synopsis of this picture was published on page 538 of our issue dated October 24, under the old title. Our readers will please observe this change in using the description.

IMP.

PEG O' THE WILDS (Two Parts—Nov. 12). Stephen Wright lives happily with his wife and baby daughter in New York. Partly in self-defense he kills a man. It is late at night when he returns home after committing the crime; his wife sleeps. His thoughts, however, are centered on his child. He steals into the bedroom, kisses his wife good-bye while she still sleeps and taking the baby in his arms, becomes a fugitive from justice. Next we find Wright in the mountains. His mind has weakened under the mental and physical strain. He seeks refuge in a cave.

Fifteen years elapse. Wright has become old and gray. His daughter, Peg, has grown to beautiful young maidenhood, ignorant of the ways of society, knowing nothing of men, save her father, or woman's dress. The wife lives alone in the east.

About this time there comes to the mountains two detectives. Frank Noble and George Dean, commissioned to corner a band of moonshiners. Noble, searching the woods one day, sees what he believes is a wild animal; he raises his rifle to shoot when there arises from the grass a girl, dressed in a single skin. She disappears. Later, he meets the girl again. Noble has purchased some store clothes and she puts them on. A light comedy love scene is interrupted by the old father who resents the appearance of a stranger. He tears the clothes from his daughter's back and sends her to the cave.

Noble has kept his romance from his coworker, Dean, but the latter learns of the affair. He is attracted by the girl and attempts to become unduly familiar with her. Noble interferes. Dean, suspecting that the girl and her father are moonshiners, enters the old man's cave. Through an old scrap of paper he manages by referring to his data book to identify the old man as Wright, wanted for murder. He telegraphs the mother to come to the mountains to make certain his identification.

The hermit finds that he is suspected; he retreats into the forest. Peg has learned of her father's danger and she asks Noble to assist her in protecting him. Dean is determined to run the old man down. However, after a long search the old man is found dying. He lives only long enough to recognize his wife of years gone by. The mother is joyous at finding the child, and we have the rest of the story taken up with the happy marriage of Noble and Peg and the making of Peg into a "real" lady.

POWERS.

SISS DOBBINS, OIL MAGNATE (Nov. 13).—On a sandy farm in California lives the Dobbins family—father, mother and daughter Sally. The village store-keeper has a son whom Sal has liked all her life. He is studying law. All of them are in straightened circumstances. An oil expert from the city visits the vicinity and finds oil traces. He decides not to tell but to buy the land cheap. He offers to buy the ranch. The old man decides to take it.

A few days later, Sal, in a tree stealing apples, hears the oil expert tell the man from town about the oil. As the old man is going to town to sign the deed, she takes out after him, and prevents the signing in the expert's face. Shortly after this they put in wells of their own, and become wealthy. Sal goes away to school and begins a new life.

Three years after elapse. Sal returns home a cultured lady and wealthy. The young lawyer has meanwhile taken out his degrees. She finds a great change in the young lawyer, who has lost his courage and acts distant and shy. She loves him, and tries to get him to propose, but he gets "cold feet" every time. At last she slips up to her room, dresses as she was before the oil strike, and wins his proposal.

CRYSTAL.

THE LIFE SAVERS (Nov. 10).—Joe and George come to the seashore; they ask a policeman to direct them to a hotel. Having heard that a wealthy young widow is staying at one of the hotels, they are anxious to meet her. The policeman directs them to an insane asylum; they beat up the cop. He picks up a brick, and throws it. It hits another arm of the law. The two cops pursue Joe and George.

Later, hearing that an enormous reward has been paid to two life savers they decide to take the part of life guards. While on the beach they see a man drowning; the widow begs them to save him, as he is her brother. They back out at the last moment and run away. The widow, learning the truth about the two fakers, has them placed in the asylum.

STERLING.

AN ILL WIND (Nov. 9).—The proud and haughty police chief of Pumpkin Center rules his force with an iron hand. After much drilling he departs for home intent on signing some valuable papers. While doing this, one of the papers is blown into the room of a girl, whose sweetheart is one of the Chief's Lieutenants. The only way to recover the paper is to crawl into the girl's room by the window, which the Chief does. While there the girl returns and the Chief takes refuge in a folding couch. The girl, hearing the noise, mistakes the Chief for a burglar, and her screams soon bring her policeman sweetheart. The Chief is roped on the couch, bundled into the patrol wagon and is taken to the police station. They finally arrive and the couch bursts open. The policemen are all horrified at discovering their prisoner is no other than their Chief. He immediately takes revenge on all concerned in the affair.

THE DOG RAFFLES (Nov. 12).—A gentleman sneak thief has for an accomplice a trick dog which enters the room of the guests by the way of the fire escape, bringing back all the valuables he may find to his master. While at work the dog comes upon a second burglar who has lighted a stick of dynamite and placed it upon the safe. The dog takes the stick of dynamite and brings it back to his master, driving the second crook ahead of him. The crooks flee, panic stricken, over the roof tops, followed by the dog, which still carries the dynamite. They find their only way of escape is by the chimney which brings them into the police station. The dog follows with the stick of dynamite and creates a panic. Police and crooks make a quick exit. After an exciting chase they arrive at the river and are forced to jump overboard. The dog, arriving at the bridge, drops the lighted stick of dynamite into the river, causing an explosion. After all danger is over the police capture the crooks and march them to the station house.

JOKER.

THE FRANKFURTER SALESMAN'S DREAM (Nov. 11). Heiny is the manufacturer and seller of frankfurters, and Mrs. Heiny is his thrifty assistant. The dog catcher of the town is his special friend in the commercial world and daily supplies his needs in the way of raw material.

One day he peddles his wares at the beach and the young people throng around him to purchase his popular "hot dogs." While in the act of courageously devouring their mid-afternoon meal, one of the girls, horrified to find a dog license, and pandemonium reigns, whereupon Heiny decides the safest place is home. Meanwhile, Mrs. Heiny is purchasing supplies and decides that two prosperous looking bears will conform with her husband's business wants.

Then Mr. Heiny, in his relaxation from what might have been from the hand of the awful crowd, falls asleep and is tormented by hordes of bears and dogs, which pronounce sentence on him, that hereafter he shall be the sausage supply instead of them, and he is cruelly plunged into the hopper and he sees himself quickly reduced to a human frankfurter. But wifie has been preparing kraut and beer, and the delicious fumes bring him back to happy earth.

DEFEAT OF FATHER (Nov. 14).—Old man Clod has a daughter, Tootzie, who is in love with Footsy. Father, however, decidedly objects to Footsy for a son-in-law. The young couple manage to sneak off anyway. Clod discovers their absence and starts out in search. Clod runs after Trickie Tread who, with her companion, Slinkfut, are out looking for an easy mark. Clod falls for Trickie's wiles. Trickie inveigles him into the skating rink to trim him.

Clod thinks he has made a sure hit. He does not however know that his daughter and Footsy have "spotted" him and are taking in all of his scandalous actions. Then, in the midst of the hilarity Slinkfut appears and announces to Clod that Trickie is his wife and demands instant reparation. Clod is only too glad to pay over the hush money. The scheming pair depart with Clod's roll, viewing their little stroke of business as an everyday affair.

But Tootzie and Footsy take advantage of the situation to further their own ends. Father, finding himself in an embarrassing position, blesses his stars that he can get out of it so easily that is, by giving his sanction to their marriage.

GOLD SEAL.

THE LAST TRUMP (15th Episode—Nov. 10).—The miners, together with Judith, Barcus and Alan, crowd to the edge of the cliff to see what has happened to the motor car containing Jimmy and Marrophat. Rose lingers behind, afraid of what she may see. Her fears are justified, for the car lies overturned and a total wreck at the foot of the cliff, the bodies of Marrophat and Jimmy visible amid the wreckage. Back in the mountain town of Mesquite, the chauffeur contrives to effect temporary repairs on his motor car and starts out with Trine, following the road taken by Marrophat and Jimmy in pursuit of the fugitives.

Judith and Rose are about all in with reaction from the strain of the last days added to their fatigue. The miners offer them the hospitality of the bunk house. They accept and retire. Alan enters the bunk house, sits down at a table, and falls asleep, his head on his folded arms. The miners make the trip down into the canyon and recover the bodies of Marrophat and Jimmy, bringing them up to camp, where they lay them out and cover them with canvas.

Late in the afternoon Judith wakes, rises with care not to disturb Rose, and steals out of the room, her purpose being to bid a last farewell to Alan. Finding him asleep, she bends over and kisses his cheek. She is surprised by Rose, who has been awakened by Judith's leaving the room, and who has, on rising, half frantic with jealousy, snatched up the revolver which Judith has thoughtlessly placed on the chair besides the bed. Judith mistakes the thought in Rose's mind and, turning to her, tears open her shirt-waist and bids her shoot. Life, she indicates, is no more worth to her, since a life without love is a thing unthinkable. Momentarily tempted, Rose lifts the revolver, but before she levels it at her sister, suddenly turns it on herself. Suicide is averted only by Alan, wakened by the sound of their voices, who springs upon Rose. Judith pockets the weapon with "a strange smile," indicating that Rose's attempted suicide has suggested one way out.

As she leaves the bunk-house, Trine's car rounds the bend in the cliff road. Judith informs him of the death of Marrophat and Jimmy. Rose and Alan come out of the cabin. Alan promptly commandeers the car. Barcus has gone for another. They start off, Judith in the middle of the rear seat, between her father and Rose, Alan in the front seat with the driver. Thus disposed, the pocket in which Judith carries her pistol, is next to Trine's left hand. The butt of the pistol protrudes temptingly. He sees. The car proceeds down a canyon road. Judith lapses into sad preoccupation. Trine takes advantage of this abstraction to snatch the revolver from its holster and level it at the back of Alan's head. Judith interferes in time to divert the shot. It enters the shoulder of the chauffeur, who loses control of the machine. It dashes over the edge of an embankment, spilling the entire party, but not injuring anybody seriously—save Trine. Barcus arrives on the scene with a seven-passenger car, and hurries the party to the nearest town and hotel. Trine remains in a coma all the way. Arriving, they transfer him to a room and summon physicians. The consensus is that, if he lives, it will be only as an even more helpless cripple than before, requiring unremitting attention. To this task, Judith dedicates her life. Two days pass and Trine is pronounced out of danger.

Alan goes down to the hotel office and telegraphs Digby, in New York, announcing his whereabouts, Trine's confusion and helplessness, and the fact that he means to marry Rose that night. Judith has intended to stop by her father's side through the ceremony, but at the last moment, she finds that she can as little endure not to see her happiness destroyed as to see it. Her father is apparently asleep as she steals from the room.

As soon as Judith leaves the room, Trine rouses, lifts himself out of his chair with both arms, and discovers that his leg will not only support him but walk as well. The accident has cured him. Dressed in dressing gown he goes to the bureau, secures the revolver, and leaves the room—moving feebly, but surely, negotiating the stairs and gaining the entrance to the chapel.

In the telegraph office a message is received:

Allan Law,

Mission Inn, Riverside, Cal.:

Marriage to Rose impossible—Rev. Mr. Wright advises me that your marriage to Judith last week was performed before interrupted by Marrophat. Judith is legally your wife—would have advised you sooner had I known where to address you. Digby.

A terrific storm breaks as a messenger boy sets out to deliver the telegram. He arrives at the Inn just as the ceremony, uniting Alan and Rose, is concluded. The manager of the hotel takes the message and calls Barcus. He reads it and starts to interrupt, but is forestalled. A cry brings everybody to face about and Judith out of hiding. Trine is seen slowly tottering up the aisle. As Alan faces him, Trine draws the revolver and levels it. At the same instant.

a flash of lightning breaks one of the windows, kills Trine instantly, kills Rose and all but kills Alan. Immediately after the accident, Barcus takes Judith aside and tells her that she must never let Alan know that Rose is dead. Judith refuses point blank. Barcus shows her the telegram, proving that she is already Alan's wife. She then yields.

When Alan at length comes to himself, she tells him: "Judith is no more." She kneels beside him, puts her arms round his head, says—"I am your wife—I love you." They kiss, but after a long embrace Alan lifts her head and holds her so that he can look deep into her eyes. He says quietly—"I know"—They embrace again.

THE TWO THIEVES (Nov. 10).—The burglar hardened by his many crimes, plans to rob a bank. He succeeds in entering it, but just before blowing the safe, he goes into the cashier's office, and stumbles over the dead body of the cashier. He has killed himself. The burglar sees a note on the desk. Reading it, he learns that it is from the cashier to his wife, saying that he was short in his accounts and that since he has disgraced his family, he would take this means of expiating his sin.

Just then the telephone rings, and for a whim, the burglar answers it. It proves to be the cashier's wife. After hanging up the receiver, his quick eye falls on the picture of a beautiful woman, the same who called over the phone, which he recognizes as the idol of his boyhood days.

Sitting there, the burglar has a vision of his school days. A little girl is crying because some boy has thrown her books in the dirt. He sees himself jump onto the boy. Then he hands the books to the little girl and swells with pride when she thanks him.

And then—the vision vanishes. Stooping over the body of the cashier, he rips his collar, shirt and coat, giving the impression of a desperate struggle. Then he quickly blows open the safe and departs. The next morning the burglar reads in the papers how Frank de Vos, the brave cashier of the First National Bank, was shot and killed while defending his patron's money. Laying aside the paper, the burglar, with a smile, draws from his pocket the meagre fruits of a hard dangerous night's work—a letter and a woman's photograph.

WHEN THE GIRLS WERE SHANGHAIED (Nov. 13).—While giving an afternoon tea, Mrs. Newlywed reads of a society slumming party, which inspires her to arrange a similar trip with her girl friends. They all decide that it shall be strictly a girl's party. Mr. Newlywed and his men friends plan to teach the girl's a lesson; accordingly they disguise as sailors. When the girls are frightened out of the cheap cabaret, they are seized by the disguised husbands and lovers and shanghaied aboard a sailing vessel. The boys, in league with the captain, put the girls to work. The girls, having made the trip in men's attire, decide to change back to girl's clothes, whereupon the boys make them think that they are on a pirate ship. After being set to many difficult tasks, such as cleaning parts of the ship, furling the sails, etc., the girls are permitted to make their escape. But the boys beat them home, where they are taught their lesson.

THE VAGABOND (Two Parts—Nov. 1).—Though Charles Ross had been unlucky in birth and upbringing though, at the opening of the story, he was looked upon as a vagabond, he had drifted through life clean-minded and happy. About our first meeting with him is in a small farm town, where he arrives via the box-car route. And about the first thing he does is to rescue a consumptive stranger from some drunken toughs. Though he spends several days caring for him, the stranger dies. He leaves a note to the new-found friend, to the effect that he is the son of a Los Angeles man who will give the vagabond a good position.

The stranger, as a youth, seemed to possess everything to make him happy and a success in life; position, money and good parents were his. Yet he drifted into bad society, like a ship without an anchorage. Drink and drugs added their downward pull. At last, in a fit of half-drunken rage, the boy left home. His mother fell ill through sorrow; she became blind, but never gave up hope that her boy would return some day.

The vagabond decides not to follow his drifting ways further. Arrived in Los Angeles, he decides to be shaved before applying for the job. This done, he is struck by his likeness to the dead youth, Tom Mason. In fact, Mason's own sister mistakes him for her brother. The vagabond tries to explain, but the blind woman's happiness overcomes his better judgment and he carries out a painful deception.

ECLAIR.

THE YELLOW STREAK (Two Parts—Nov. 11).—Unlike many of the ring fighters, Kid Donovan lived a clean, vigorous, straight-forward life. His strength, combined with his cleverness, has gained an enviable reputation for him in the boxing ring. It is after his fifth consecutive victory that his friends and followers hail him as the next champion. His manager tells him that his next battle will surely be for the championship of the world.

The "Kid," who has obtained a good education and moves in the "better" society, is deeply in love with the winsome daughter of a local politician.

The girl reciprocates his love, but abhors the work he has chosen to follow; she finally tells him that he must give up the ring if he expects to marry her. It is a struggle for the "Kid," but he finally determines to consent; he promises not to fight for the championship. Soon after this the newspapers are full of the "Kids" wonderful record and of his forthcoming challenge to the champion. True to his promise, the young fighter refuses to enter the ring. For this he is branded as a coward by his manager, and is accused of being "yellow" by his former followers.

Unable to find work, the "Kid" is advised by the girl to join the fire department. Through influence, he secures an appointment. Shortly after, the girl is injured in a big fire; she is rescued by her sweetheart in a sensational manner. However, it is found necessary to send the girl away in order to save her life. But money is short. In desperation, the "Kid" goes to the champion with a challenge. The latter's manager accepts upon the condition that Donovan will "lay down," and the fighter's "yellow streak" is played to the front again.

The night of the fight arrives. As the battle between the "Kid" and the champion progresses it is seen that the title holder is going to be badly beaten. In the tenth round, after a minute of desperate fighting, the "Kid" puts over his right and the champion drops for the count of ten. In the mad rush to crown Donovan champion, the story of his "yellow streak" is soon forgotten. The "Kid," however, thinks nothing of his new title or his reputation—it is to the girl that he goes and with him is the "purse" which will save her life by allowing her to go into the country. Does the girl accept it? She does, and also the boy as her best champion.

BISON.

THE SILENT PERIL (Two Parts—Nov. 14).—Jack Parsons, supposedly a social butterfly, is in reality a secret service operative and an expert on control by wireless. In the course of an experiment, Parsons generates an alien electrical wave which is not only dangerous to everything in its path, but unless controlled, dangerous to the experimenter. In the use Parsons makes of this wave to combat and destroy the "boat" owned by a foreign government we have the greatest excitement of the play.

The newspapers publish an article relative to the merits of a "powerless boat" so called, then in the hands of a foreign government. In his office, the Secretary of State reads the article. While engaged with the paper, a clerk hands the Secretary a translated code message, which informs him the boat is an unparralleled success and, in its present hands, a decided menace. The Secretary calls upon Parsons, who is aboard to either confirm or refute the report concerning the boat. Tully, a clerk, overhears the conversation between Jack and the Secretary, and loses no time in selling his information to the Baroness Alda, who buys and sells diplomatic secrets. The Baroness hastens to another foreign agent, who agrees with her that Jack must not reach his destination. On board ship, Jack recognizes the Baroness. To avoid being shadowed when he leaves the ship, Parson sprays their stateroom with Kelene, a powerful anesthetic. The pair succumb and Parsons leaves the ship.

During the trip Jack has met Marie Von Glahn, to whom he lost his heart. At the foreign wharf Marie is met by her father, to whom Parsons is presented.

Once ashore, Parsons loses no time in gaining a sight of the mysterious boat. Convinced that the craft is indeed a menace, Parsons decides to destroy it. To this end he swims to the boat, attaches thereto his "interrupter," then awaits results. Nor has he long to wait. The boat leaves shore, its movements being plain to the anxious Parsons. He throws a switch onto his transformer. Instantly the boat is a wreck. At a table, in the control station on shore, sits Von Glahn, dead, the alien wave having done its work. Marie, with her father at the time of the "accident," hastens for assistance. Parsons, returning from shore, meets her. Together they return to the control station, where Parsons learns that the boat's creator was none other than the father of the girl to whom he has given his heart.

VICTOR.

THE LASS O' KILLIKRANKIE (Two Parts—Oct. 26).—When the parents of Laurie Killikrankie realized their daughter was of marriageable age, each sets about to find her a mate. Dame Killikrankie selected Laird MacNutt. The father favored Laird MacNabb. Laurie decided that Tammy, a poor stalwart lad, was the ideal of her dreams. In her rambles she generally managed, with the aid of her dog, to come across this lad. The parents were ignorant of these meetings.

The rivals, the Lairds MacNutt and MacNabb, were invited to visit the cottage and press their suit. When the two men arrive, each accompanied by his champion, Laurie flouts them—turns a cold ear to their pleadings. She runs to her room, locks the door and sits by the window. MacNabb is below, talking to Dame Killikrankie. Laurie, taking up the flower pot, drops it upon his head.

Grandfather, who happens along, observes this incident. His sympathies being with the girl and her suitor, an idea suggests itself. He informs MacNutt that MacNabb threw the flower pot. MacNutt, believing him, hurls the pot at MacNabb. The throw is effective. The two men engage each other in a terrific combat. Laurie and the old man look on, enjoyingly. Father and mother rush in to protect their particular choice. They lead the boys into the house, put them to bed and attend to their wounds.

Tammy, who has been chased from the house by the father, runs into a sword fight; several men have waylaid a soldier. The assailants, frightened by Tammy's intrusion, flee. As a reward for saving him, the soldier makes Tammy a member of his band. Tammy returns for Laurie at the gathering of the clan as Dame Killikrankie arranges to have Laurie married to MacNutt. Tammy, now a soldier, throws both suitors from the house, overawes the parents and commands the priest, brought by the old grandfather, to marry Laurie to him. The parents give their blessings, as there is nothing better to do, and the clan rejoices at the happy outcome.

THE WITCH GIRL (Two Parts—Oct. 30).—William Prentiss, financier and bachelor, stormed about when his doctor informed him he must go to a sanitarium. But the case was urgent and the financier consented. Doctor Smith's sanitarium was in the Blue Ridge mountains. It proved an attractive place for Prentiss. In time, the rest and air brought improved vigor. His interest in life returned. Doctor Smith, head of the institution, had many patients to look after. Feeling the need of rest from overwork, he went into the woods for a stroll. A sprained ankle was responsible for his finding an assistant in Hans, a woodcutter, working in the forest. Hans helped Dr. Smith to old Granny Robbins' cottage. The good woman eased the pain. She promised to send the doctor some of her beneficial herbs by her young daughter, known as the Witch Girl, who seldom left the forest glades. Thanking Granny, the doctor returned.

Hans was sent for the Witch Girl. He called from crag to crag, and at last, down by the mountain pool, came a faint answer. The girl came when she chose. She disliked gathering herbs, because it meant wading about in the marsh where Granny's pigs grunted and wallowed. But she made the best of it and took a full basket to the sanitarium. That afternoon it was Mr. Prentiss' turn to be strolling in the woods. Suddenly he came upon a scene that made his eyes open—an elfin creature dancing about a tree on which she had pinned a magazine reproduction of his palatial home. He talked to her. She much wanted to see the wonderful house as it really was. When Prentiss suggested a way she consented.

Prentiss met her in his automobile. At the house, she was aquiver with excitement, particularly so when the housekeeper dressed her in an embroidered gown. And then she dined with Mr. Prentiss. The girl's beauty and the wine inflamed the mind of Prentiss; he tried to kiss her. She fought him off and fled upstairs, donned again her ragged clothes and escaped from the house by a second story window. Her pet pigeon, which she had brought with her, she let fly with a note to Granny. It brought Hans and the doctor to her rescue, after she had spent the night hiding in the grounds.

A year passes. There is much meditation on the part of Prentiss. He decides to go out and win the girl in the right way.

HIS HEART, HIS HAND AND HIS SWORD (First of "Terrance O'Rourke, Soldier of Fortune" Series) (Two Parts—Nov. 9).—O'Rourke, soldier of fortune and hero of many wars, finds himself in Paris without funds. In a spirit of recklessness, he pawns a valuable watch given him by a greatful republic for services rendered. With the proceeds he enters a prominent Parisian restaurant to dine. There he attracts the attention of the Princess de Grandlieu, her husband, the Prince, and her legal advisor, M. Adolph Chambret. While there an incident occurs which earns the hatred of her advisor, who is in love with her.

Later O'Rourke repairs to a gambling house, adjacent to the restaurant. The Princess and party go to a ball at the Hotel Ritz. As usual, the young adventurer attempts to increase his fortune and, as usual, he loses all. Meantime, the Princess receives a note, by messenger, from her brother, telling her that he is in danger of being killed in the desert of Sahara, where he is attempting to establish an Empire against the Princess' wishes. The note also informs her that the Prince, her husband, is at the bottom of it all, as his fortune will revert to her at his death and thus the Prince will gain control of more money.

Out of loyalty to her brother, the Princess plans a rescue party which she hopes to have O'Rourke lead. Her adviser is ordered to search him out and bring him to her. Chambret finds O'Rourke in the gambling house, broke. He insults him by referring to a rose received from the Princess. O'Rourke, not waiting for explanations, knocks Chambret down and speeds away.

The Princess, on her way home, is insulted by the Prince, who endeavors to learn the contents of the note she has received. O'Rourke hears her scream for help; he pursues in a taxicab, effects a rescue and takes the Princess home. There he is told of the mission which she wants him to undertake. Of course the adventurer agrees to her wish much to the discomfiture of the Prince and Chambret.

A GIRL OF THE PEOPLE (Two Parts—Nov. 13). Hilda was hardly more than a child when she came to America. Yet it was on the ship that she first met the man who was afterward to take her hand in marriage. Hilda loved dancing and, one afternoon, on the ship's deck, she spun around to the notes of a violin played by an old man. For this her father beat her. John Maine, an artist, interfered. Hilda and her father are met at the pier my Michael, a degenerate brute, who is the foreman of a sweat shop. He offers the girl work at a sum unheard of by her father; the father sees a chance to remain home in laziness and consents.

Six years elapse. Hilda has grown to beautiful girlhood. Michael, desiring her love, forces his attentions on her. When she repulses him he gives her more work to do and sends her home. Later, he complains to the girl's father that Hilda is too proud—that she refuses to kiss him. The father promises that the child shall reform. When Michael is gone, he beats the girl and tells her to obey the man who give them their bread.

At the shop the next morning Michael again attempts to make love to the girl. Hilda throws him off, escapes from the shop, determined to be left alone. Fearing to return to her father, she makes her way into the country, where she finds shelter with a gipsy band. Here she is taught by Rig, the leader, to tell fortunes. It is only a short time, however, before Rigo becomes enamoured with the girl's beauty and he too attempts to force his attentions upon her. To protect herself, Hilda steals a pistol from Rigo's mattress. Soon after, she shoots a young farmer while in the woods, believing that it was Rigo following her. She discovers her mistake, imagines that she has committed murder, and flees. Rigo and some farmers find the wounded man; he was only slightly hurt, but Rigo sees a chance to get control of Hilda by reason of the act.

By stealing a ride in a freight car, Hilda finds her way back to the city. Here she finds employment as a maid in a dancing school. It is not long before she shows marked talent for dancing and the teacher takes an interest in her. Later Hilda finds great popularity dancing for the public. Her picture often finds its way into the newspapers.

A SLICE OF LIFE (Two Parts—Nov. 9).—Boyd Harte, a young physician, loves his neighbor, Betty Morse. Mrs. Morse approves of the match; so does Betty's cousin Tom, Chief of Police. Betty likes Boyd, but does not love him. Betty has ambitions to write. She takes a story to Long, an editor, who tells her the style is good, but her story has no real plot, and tells her to write a bit of real life, and he will take it. Betty wonders where she can find this "slice of life." She appeals to her cousin Tom for help, and accordingly visits the police station, and asks to be shown through the cells. Betty is a favorite with the force, and takes with her a huge bunch of roses to distribute among the officers and prisoners. Some time before this a man had been found wandering about the city streets and apparently suffering from loss of memory, as he was unable to account for himself. The policeman brought him to the station, and the man, Jim, was placed in a cell to await inquiries. The sergeant shows Betty through the prison. She becomes greatly interested in Jim, and gives him the last rose of her bunch.

Betty appeals to Boyd. Boyd visits the station with her, and is given charge of Jim. Jim is taken to the hospital. As he grows better he is given light tasks to perform as an aid to growing memory. Apparently possessed of all his mental faculties—except that he cannot remember who he is, where he came from, he is given in charge of his office work. One day Jim feels the touch of returning genius, is in the grip of inspiration and works furiously on the typewriter. Strolling about the hospital yard, Boyd again declares his love to Betty. She gently refuses him. They return to Boyd's office, and find Jim writing away. Betty's rush forward is checked by Boyd, who recognizes the scene before him as part of the reorganizing of his patient. Jim finishes, seems like a man awakening from a dream. When Boyd and Betty question him he explains how he suddenly felt like writing, Betty looks over the written matter, and announces that Jim had written a masterpiece. She tells them she is going to take it to an editor. Boyd keeps Jim with him. Betty takes Jim's story to Long, who agrees with her judgment. On being told the story, she tells him she has unearthed a genius. Betty takes Long's check for the story back to Jim.

Jim and Betty write together, and are successful. Mrs. Morse does not approve of it, as she does not want her daughter to marry a man without a name. Boyd is forced to look on as she gives her heart to another. For Jim is a man.

As the story unfolds we have seen a woman and her two little children turned out of a home by a brutal landlord. Jessie takes her children to a tenement room. She is unable to work. The baby falls ill. The only money brought in is made by Bobby, the seven-year-old lad, who sells papers. Bobby goes hungry in order to purchase medicine for the baby. One day Betty sees Bobby trying to sell his papers. She is touched by the brave little figure. She questions him, learns of the sick baby, and accompanies him home. There she finds Jessie quite ill herself, with no food in the house. Betty hurries away and returns with Boyd and a basket of food.

Later, thinking to get material for writing, Betty takes Jim with her and visits the tenement. Jessie sees Jim and springs to meet him, crying "Jim, my husband." Jim's memory surges back Betty has found her slice of life. Jim is reunited with his family. Betty allows Boyd, who understands, to place his ring on her finger.

THE STOLEN MASTERPIECE (Nov. 11).—A wealthy clubman is in love with a girl whose father objects to their marriage until he has proved himself worthy. The girl's butler schemes with an artist friend to steal a valuable painting of which there has never been a copy, reproduce it, substitute the copy and sell the original. Meanwhile, the husband of the artist's sister counterplots with a friend to steal the original painting while the artist is replacing the copy. The lover suspicions the butler, turns detective, and follows him to the artist's house, where he hears the plot. The artist's brother-in-law, awaiting his chance to steal the original, hides his accomplice in the same place where the young detective is watching developments. He overcomes the intruder, climbs the fire escape, is taken for the accomplice and secures the picture, reaching the house in time to capture the butler and artist when they attempt to replace the copy. By frustrating the plots, he sets himself right with the girl's father, and proves the right to win her.

CASEY'S VENDETTA (Nov. 1).—Casey, the policeman, has everybody bluffed except his wife, who rules the house and lords it over Casey. Pedro runs a fruit stand on Casey's beat, and Nina, sweetheart of the former, also sells fruit. Casey eats Pedro's fruit and refuses to pay. Then he starts a flirtation with Nina, who likes it. Pedro, who is a member of the Black Hand, determines to be revenged. He sends Casey a note, demanding $500, or the Black Hand will take his life. Casey sees in this a good chance to get rid of his better half. He changes the world "life" to "wife," and shows her the letter, telling her that she would better disguise herself and keep out of sight. Then he returns to Nina and continues his love-making. Pedro, enraged, captures Casey and locks him up in an old mill. But Nina runs to the police and offers to lead them to the rescue. The wife, missing Casey, also appeals to the police and is invited to go along. When Nina sees his wife rush into Casey's arms, she is with difficulty restrained from attacking him. Mrs. Casey learns the truth about the Black Hand note. Her spouse is stripped of his uniform and dragged home to punishment.

DOUGH AND DYNAMITE (Two Parts—Oct. 26).—The bakers in the employ of Monsieur La Vie go on strike. In the emergency Pierre and Jacques, the waiters, take possession of the kitchen, and as there is quite a bit of jealousy between them, on account of the female waitresses who smile impartially on both, it is not long before the dough is flying. Meanwhile, the strikers have conspired. They drill a hole in a loaf of bread and insert therein a stick of dynamite, cleverly replacing the piece of crust on the end of the loaf. Then they give it to a little girl, instructing her to carry it to the bakery and explaining that because the bread is too heavy her mother has sent it back. The wife of Monsieur La Vie returns the child's money, and orders are given to the bakers to put the loaf back in the oven and bake it some more. They comply. The whole establishment is in a demoralized state. Customers in the cafe cannot get waited upon. The cook is in a towering temper. Pierre is clubbed on the head by the strikers, and goes about in a maudlin condition, getting himself and everybody else into all sorts of trouble. And then—the dynamited loaf explodes! The innocent victims are buried in splintered ovens, broken china, an earthquake of pastry and bursting flour sacks—and huge mounds of dough heave fitfully where human hearts once throbbed. At the very end of the tragedy we see the yeasty mass churning and swelling—and then, out of the sticky lump, the unfortunate Pierre thrusts a gluey head.

PRINCESS.

THE DEAD LINE (Oct. 30).—Jack wished to marry Polly, but when he asked her father for her hand he was landed out in the street. Viewing the home militia at drill gives Jack an idea. When they stack guns to go and have a drink, the desperate lover takes them and plants them along the roadside, loaded with blanks. Then he ties strings to the triggers so that when they are pulled a broadside will be fired. After the first valley the news is given out that the Mexicans have captured the town. The militia, finding that their guns have been confiscated, call on the police department for assistance, and under cover of the excitement Jack and Polly elope. After the ceremony, Jack sends a messenger to declare a truce. But Polly's father already has discovered the ruse, when the army of defense tries to drown out the ambushed army of invasion. His son-in-law's cleverness, however, appeals to the obdurate old gentleman, and the elopers are forgiven.

ROYAL.

MAX'S MONEY (Nov. 7).—Max and his wife are employed as butler and maid in the home of a wealthy banker. The banker and his wife go to a summer resort for a short stay, leaving the servants in charge of the house. Max finds his master's wallet containing many good-sized bills, and his wife persuades him to take her for a vacation on the money. Meanwhile, Max has fallen heir to a huge fortune on the other side of the water, and a law firm has detectives hunting him. The banker and his wife discover that they have left the wallet behind and wire for it. They find that their house is empty. Returning by the next train, they collide with Max and his wife, who have squandered the money wildly and have been evicted from their last stopping place. The detectives also arrive upon the scene, and Max thinks that he is to be arrested. He runs for his life. But after an exciting chase, he is captured and hauled back, when he and everybody concerned learn of his amazing good fortune.

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (Chapter 42—Nov. 2).—Our Mutual Girl's interest in the shops is unquenchable. Recently she spent half a day looking at all the gorgeous new gowns and rich furs at Stern Brothers. Then she was seized with a laudable ambition to visit the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—suggested perhaps by the sight of so many pelts on exhibition.

So she went to the Twenty-sixth street office of the president and joined the society. The president gave her a pass to the Bideawee Home and the dog pound, and that same afternoon she visited the refuge of stray canines in New York. When she was shown a kennel of twenty or more dogs who were to be asphyxiated the following morning, she decided on the spot to adopt the homeless creatures and save them from such a fate. But first she telephoned Ralph Hamilton, to ask his advice, and that young man drove in haste to the kennels to dissuade her from her rash undertaking. A quarrel ensued, and Ralph left in high dudgeon. Then Margaret entered her limousine, accompanied by about a score of dogs all yelping in chorus, and started for Westchester.

En route she met a brutal truck driver who was abusing his horse. Our Mutual Girl had the man arrested and promised to appear in court against him. At last she landed the dogs at her country home. Meanwhile Ralph had repented of his attempt to thwart Our Mutual Girl's humane purposes. He motored about the country in remorseful state of mind, and arrived at the house after Margaret had consigned her pets to a large yard formerly used for chickens. While she was busy ordering dog food over the telephone, he slipped into the yard, and when she returned she found him there, making much of two forlorn puppies, a fact which considerably melted her heart. Young Hamilton is beginning to find out that he must comply in the least, as well as the greatest, things, if he would win the regard and friendly confidence of Our Mutual Girl.

THE MINER'S PERIL (Nov. 4).—Jimson, a mine foreman, discharges Pedro and Madro for trying to steal ore and when they attack him, he is forced to beat them up. They swear vengeance. Their enmity is intensified when Jimson rescues, Nina, a Mexican girl, from the unwelcome attentions of Pedro. Nina and Jimson fall in love, and after the marriage, Pedro and his pal follow them as they ride away over the hills. Near the shack holding the windlass which supports the cable drum for the big ore bucket, they capture both Jimson and the girl. Nina is bound in a corner of the shack, while Pedro and Madro put Jimson, tied hand and foot in the ore bucket, suspended several hundred feet above the rocks below. Then they place a long candle upon a table beneath the rope holding the bucket and light it. It is evident that when the candle burns down to the rope Jimson will drop with the bucket to his death. Then, leaving their victim to his fate, the Mexicans hurry away. Nina struggles in vain. The candle is almost down to the rope. Near to where she is tied, is a long plank, propped against the wall. She can just reach it with her foot. She pushes it, and it falls outward across the table on top of the candle, extinguishing the flame. Nina and Jimson are rescued by the morning shift of workmen.

A WOMAN SCORNED (Two Parts—Nov. 7).—A robbery is committed by yeggs, and a famous detective, aided by a newspaper reporter, sets out to capture the robbers. A bottle containing a few drops of "soup" leads the detective and the reporter to the railroad yards, where they discover the remains of a camp fire, and stamped into the dust nearby is the wrapper which once held the dynamite from which the "soup" was made. The wrapper is marked "80% nitro," and inquiries at a nearby hardware shop disclose the fact that this grade is to be purchased only at the main powder factory. A visit to the factory further divulges that the dynamite was bought by one "George Williams" for the avowed purpose of blasting tree stumps. Securing the signed page of the factory receipt book, the detective and newspaper man scour the slum hotels and boarding houses for the man "Williams" whose signature, reversed, they finally find on a hotel register. They raid his room, but he and his pals make their get-away. All the efforts of the sleuths appear to have come to naught—and then a former sweetheart of Williams, whom he has abused and discarded, offers her assistance. The fury of a woman scorned results in their capture.

MAJESTIC.

THE TEAR THAT BURNED (Two Parts—Nov. 8).—Meg was one of the "painted women," who had got to the point where she did not care. Anita, her room-mate, on her death-bed told the cadet who managed them both about her old blind mother in another State who recently had come into a small fortune, and how she had kept hoping to go back home—but now it was too late. After the burial, the cadet told Meg that he had money in sight. She was to go with him and impersonate Anita. When she had won the confidence of the blind old woman, they would make a rich haul, and then go and live straight together. Anita's mother welcomed her long-lost daughter, as she supposed Meg to be, and everything that she had to give she showered upon this hardened woman of the underworld. Every night she would go to her bedside and her tears of joy burned into Meg's calloused heart. Delay on the girl's part angered the cadet. When Meg confessed to him that she could not bring herself to defraud the love-hungry old woman who called her "daughter," he threatened to expose her and give her over to the law. But a burglar, escaping from the police, ran across the cadet's path and the latter stopped the bullet. He was a stranger with an unsavory reputation. Nobody cared. And Meg heard the news with a deeper feeling than mere joy. Her past was dead. And there was the old blind mother to live for and love.

DESTINY'S NIGHT (Two Parts—Nov. 11).—Mr. and Mrs. Borden, who own a fine home in the city, go to the shore, neglecting to notify the police that their house is unguarded for the summer. "Educated Dan" Miller, gentleman burglar, makes a professional call one evening and while he is going through the upstairs rooms, Maude Dunwoodie, "society worker" of the Badger Gang, visits the downstairs. Miller hears a noise, and looks through a door in time to see Maude secreting some silver under her cloak. Realizing that here thief meets thief, he derermines to pose to her as the owner of the house. Maude tells him her story and how she never has had a chance. While they are talking, some one rings the bell. On investigation, Miller discovers a baby on the doorstep. He brings it in and Maude feeds it and cares for it. The sight somehow takes a strong hold on Miller's emotions. He confesses to Maude who he is, and asks her if she will marry him and bring up the baby on the square. As they are preparing to leave, Borden, who has received a hasty summons back to the city, enters. Seeing lights in the house, he has brought with him a policeman and his chauffeur. He takes a fancy, however, to Maude and Miller. Telling them to name the baby for him, he allows them to go free, wishing them goodbye and good luck.

THE GAME OF LIFE (Two Parts—Nov. 6).—Amy Clune, sweetheart and stenographer to Jim Boyd, a struggling young contractor, repels the attentions of Jim Malone, a political boss. Malone tells Boyd to put him right with Amy and he will give him contracts enough to establish his reputation for the rest of his life. Boyd refuses and kicks Malone out of the office. To lessen expenses for Boyd, Amy looks for another position. Malone sees her advertisement in the paper and gets Mme. Roberts, who keeps an immoral house, to lure Amy there. The girl soon realizes that she has been trapped. Malone comes to the room where Madame has left Amy alone, and tells her that if she will consent to become his mistress he will not only give her everything she could wish for, but will also give her the signed contracts for John Boyd. Amy acquiesces, telling him first to go to his office for the papers. While he is gone she writes a note to the effect that she is imprisoned at No. 18 Adams street, and asks the finder to deliver it to 102 Preston street. She then drops it from the window. John Boyd and the police reach the house just in time to rescue the girl, who is having a fierce struggle with Malone. The house is raided and the political boss arrested. When Amy and Boyd reach home, she shows him the contracts with Malone's signature.

IN THE CLUTCHES OF THE GANGSTERS (Two Parts—Nov. 13).—Chick Hodge, Red Corrigan and their gang decide to attend Alderman Finn's picnic as uninvited guests with the hope of obtaining a little easy money. Chick meets Molly Mason who invites him to call, but recalls the invitation when she learns that he belongs to the "Corrigan Gang." The girl has made an impression on Chick, and when asked to put Cohen out of the way and get his money, he refuses, telling the boys that he is going to reform. He obtains a position in the wholesale district and starts to save money; he makes good and he and Molly plan to be married.

IN OLD ITALY (Two Parts—Nov. 5).—Raniero Benedetti, an Italian criminal masquerading in the guise of a gentleman, has won the love of Beatrice Nuccoli, and plans to lead her into an immoral life. Antonio Fasani, a gendarme, recognizes the badly wanted fugitive, Raniero Benedetti. Beatrice is taken out by Raniero and drugged; she is taken to a cellar dungeon and sold by him. Beatrice's parents, worried over the absence of Beatrice, appeal to the gendarmes for aid. Antonio goes to their house, is shown a picture of Beatrice and recognizes her as the girl he saw with Raniero. He trails Raniero and rescues Beatrice. The gendarmes raid Raniero's place. Raniero escapes and takes to smuggling. Antonio and his assistants leave for the border to capture Raniero. Antonio is injured. Raniero escapes and seeks shelter in Antonio's house, saying he is a traveler lost in the mountains. Beatrice, who has become Antonio's wife, recognizes Raniero. He seeks to make love to her, but she escapes from him, and leaves the house on horseback. Raniero pursues her; he overtakes her; starts to throw her over the cliff when he is spied by Antonio, who shoots and kills him.

THE FRIEND (Two Parts—Nov. 12).—Grant Keller, a wealthy young artist and society leader, unable to find a model to his liking, advertises for one. Daisy Edwards, who has lost her position as a salesgirl, applies and is accepted. Grant and Daisy fall in love with each other, but Grant becomes engaged to a girl of his own social set, and Daisy bravely releases him. An uncle leaves Daisy three thousand dollars, and by hard work, aided by her small fortune, she becomes a successful miniature painter, patronized by society. Bruce Livingston, who calls at her studio for his sister's portrait, falls in love with the attractive artist, and when they become engaged he tells his friend, Grant Keller, of his fiancee. Grant calls on Daisy and demands that she tell Livingston that she was formerly his model and in love with him. She protests that she had given Keller his chance without a murmur, and why will he not give her hers? Grant will not promise, and after considerable mental struggle, he decides that it is his duty as Livingston's friend, to tell him the truth. Bruce is maddened with jealousy, refuses to listen to Daisy's pleadings and leaves her. The girl is broken-hearted. She seeks forgetfulness in a whirl of false gaiety. At the end of a year she drowns herself.

THANHOUSER.

KEEPING A HUSBAND (Nov. 8).—On the morning of her silver wedding anniversary, Mrs. Strong writes in her diary—"Married twenty-five years today, and I still love my husband." At breakfast there are flowers and gifts from John, and the day opens happily. Later, the daughter of an old friend arrives for a promised visit. She is a very attractive little thing, and at the lawn party, given by a neighbor, Miss Ray and John Strong become obviously devoted. Mrs. Strong goes home early. "Good husbands are hard to get," she says to herself, "I am going to keep mine." When Strong and the youthful visitor return, their philanderings in the hall are interrupted by the entrance of the wife. The next moment they realize that she does not see them, but is gliding past with eyes fixed, like one walking in her sleep. Strong goes to their room greatly concerned. Caddie pretends to be asleep. He bends over her, chafes her hands, listens anxiously to her breathing. Then the maid knocks with a note from Miss Ray. Mrs. Strong awakes. The message reads: "Thanks for a delightful visit. But I am homesick for the city and am leaving by the first train in the morning." Mrs. Strong puts her arms around the husband whom she had loved twenty-five years. And as he buries his face in her shoulder she kisses the top of his head and smiles wisely.

THE TERROR OF ANGER (Two Reels—Nov. 10).—Gilbert Rawlings, a wealthy business man is in ignorance of the fact that his wife has ceased to care for him and is overwhelmed by the shock when he discovers that she has gone and receives a letter telling him that she will never return to him. He is heartbroken and pursues the eloping couple, but his chase is a short one, for the auto in which his wife and her companion are riding plunger over a cliff and they are killed.

Returning to his home, Rawlings gazes upon his infant son and his mind affected by the shock, feels a very overwhelming hatred towards all womenkind. He dreams that he takes his son out to the wilderness and teaches him to be a savage, and to hate women. A young girl traveling with a party of tourists strays into the forest and Rawlings makes her a drudge. The son, primitive by training, yet feels a great regard for the girl, which Rawlings abused with hatred, and in consequence treats her with greatest severity. Finally she induces the boy to aid her to escape. Rawlings pursues them and in a fight with his son, when he is about to kill him, he suddenly awakes and finds that the dream in which he played so important a part, was only a dream, but it has a good effect, for it teaches him, false as his wife was, that the majority of women are true.

SHORE ACRES (All Star—Five Parts—Oct. 26).—Shore Acres was left by their mother to Nathaniel and Martin Berry. Nathaniel being the older, has taken care of Martin, who was a child at the time of his mother's death, and deeded over his share of the farm to Martin, and went to join the rebellion, when he found that they both loved the same girl, and she seemed to show a preference toward Martin.

On Nathaniel's return home he again took up his work on the farm, and also as custodian to what was known as Berry Light—the light house off the coast of Maine. Martin, the younger brother, a good man at heart, but easily influenced, is approached by Josiah Blake to mortgage the farm, and with the proceeds to cut it up into building lots to be used as a summer colony. The many "air castles" that he builds in Martin's mind finally gain the latter's consent.

Blake also tries to win Martin's daughter Helen, better known as Nell, and Martin, thinking it advantageous to have Blake in the family gives his consent. Nell is in love with Sam Warner, a young physician of the town. Warner is thinking of going West to grow up with the country, and Helen pleads with him to take her along. She appeals to her uncle Nat, who has always looked upon her as his baby, and he advises her going with Sam. Blake suspects that an elopement is imminent and hints to Helen's father at Sam's departure, in a way that sets him to thinking and poisons his mind.

Martin starts out to find his daughter. His first visit is to Sam's office; discovering the place dismantled, he now believes Blake's story and starts for the shore, gun in hand, intent on killing Sam Warner. He gets there just in time to see the young couple embarking on Captain Ben Wilson's boat. He by this time has been wrought to such a state of mind that he would stop at nothing. He makes for the light house just as a storm is blowing up. As he enters the light house, he sees his older brother Nathaniel about to fill the lamp and light it to guide the boats through safety during the storm. He points the gun at his brother and threatens to kill him if he attempts to light the lamp. There a fight ensues and Nathaniel gains possession of the gun, and rushes to the light house tower and lights the lamp. During this time the boat with Sam and Helen on has been tossing about on the rough waters. When the rays from the light house are seen by those on the boat, they are much relieved to find that they have miraculously escaped the reefs.

There is a lapse of a year and a half. The picture shows Christmas Eve in the old homestead. Martin, who has always felt reproachful for his treatment towards Nell, is sitting at a table quietly thinking of the past, while the children are jumping around the room in happy anticipation of what Santa Claus is bringing them. Nat steals into the kitchen and sends the children to bed and then asks Martin's aid in helping to fill their stockings. Martin goes about it half heartedly at first, but gradually enters into it with the holiday spirit. Nat then leaves the room and reappears with Nell and Sam and the baby. Martin is overjoyed at the reunion.

SALOMY JANE (Calif. M. P. Co.—Six Parts—Nov. 9).—The story opens with the arrival in Hangtown of Madison Clay and his daughter, Salomy Jane, who have emigrated all the way from Kentucky. Straightway the young men and bachelors of the camp fall desperately in love with Salomy Jane. Her preference at first is for Rufe. Almost simultaneously with Clay's arrival the "Man" comes to Hangtown via the overland stage coach. He finds his way to the town bar and there recognizes Baldwin, who, before coming West, had betrayed the "Man's" sister. The "Man" following comes upon him just in time to save Salomy from his insults. They grapple, but Baldwin breaks away and runs through the woods to his cabin where he begins packing with intent of leaving the community. Meantime Salomy, outraged at the insults of Baldwin, offers to marry Rufe on condition he kills him. Rufe demurs, but, passing Baldwin's cabin a short while afterward, hears noise of a fight inside and looking through the window sees the "Man" kill Baldwin. Remembering Salomy's promise, Rufe tells her that the crime is his, whereupon they become engaged.

While this has been happening, Red Pete Heath, a worthless habitant of Hangtown, and a partner hold up the stage, wounding Yuba Bill, the driver. This crime, together with the murder of Baldwin, occasions a meeting of the vigilantes, who begin to scour the countryside for the offenders. At the same time these guardians of the law are given another source of worry. A letter from a kinsman has advised Larabee that there is a blood feud between his and Clay's family. The two antagonists meet and each declare that he will kill the other. In the midst of this excitement Salomy meets the "Man" on the road. She thinks at first that he may be one of the robbers. He, however, disabuses her in this respect, but admits that it was he who killed Baldwin. She brings the "Man" provisions and bids him good-bye with obvious reluctance. Then, acquainted with Rufe's deceit, she breaks her engagement with him.

With the booty taken by Red Pete from the stage was a bracelet which falls into the hands of his little girl. She in turn gives it to Salomy. Yuba Bill sees it, recognizes it; thus the responsibility of the hold-up is fixed. In the chase that ensues Red Pete is taken after a sensational tumble over a cliff and his partner killed. Meanwhile one party of vigilantes have taken the "Man," thinking him Red Pete's accomplice. Red Pete's word and the report that the real accomplice has been killed, rights this mistake and the vigilantes are on the point of releasing the "Man," when Rufe declares him Baldwin's murderer. It is decided to hang him alongside Red Pete. Red Pete's wife bids him a tearful farewell. When it is asked if there is anyone to tell the stranger good-bye, Salomy embraces and kisses him.

The "Man" makes his escape a little later and returns to Salomy, who, to protect him from Rufe, disguises him in her father's hat and coat. Larabee seeing him thus dressed, mistakes him for Clay and shoots at him. The bullet hits the brim of the stranger's hat. The "Man," in his turn, shoots and kills Larabee. Clay is suspected of this crime. He is forewarned by Starbottle. Thinking that Salomy has killed his enemy, the father assumes the guilt, saddles his horse and rides away. Meanwhile Salomy has joined the man and the two of them make their escape after a sensational fight, including a ride down the river on a log.

Hangtown left far behind, Madison Clay meets his daughter and her lover. The whole tangle is explained away by the "Man's" admission that he killed Larabee. Thus reconciled to Salomy, the father finds another horse that the three may ride toward a new home. The stranger and Salomy ride together.

THE POOR LITTLE RICH BOY.—Billy, who has been brought up in seclusion, wants to mix in with youngsters of his age. At a childrens' picnic a ball game is proposed; "Red" Hogan and "Freckles" Reilly choose for sides. Neither wants Billy on his team. In response to his pleas they let him umpire. Billy has to make a close decision which results in a fight. He is rescued by the little girl whom he admires, but his cup is filled to overflowing when "Red" Hogan knocks a "homer" and receives attention from the fair rescuer.

That night he dreams he sees himself at the bat with the bases full, two gone and four runs needed to win. He knocks the ball over the fence and wins the game, thus winning admiration of the fair one.

A CHANGE OF HEART (Two Parts).—James Mason has fallen in with bad companions and becomes known to the police as "Handsome Harry." He has just finished a five-year term in prison. Though inclined to reform, he listens to the plea of his pals and consents to renew operations. Under the name of the Morgan Syndicate they carry on their "get-rich-quick" business. The police receive complaints concerning the syndicate. They decide to change the name to the National Investment Company, and offer new inducements. Thus they send out accounts of their oil properties and the large profits which may be expected. Helen Lewis, an elderly widow in the country, who has five thousand dollars, receives one. She writes the confidence men that she is interested and is coming to the city. She requests one of them to meet her at the station. Mason is delegated by his pals to meet her.

The unsophisticated woman falls an easy prey to the bunco men and gives them her five thousand dollars and receives certificates of stock. She sees in Mason's watch a photograph of an elderly woman. He tells her it is a picture of his mother who died ten years before. The old lady tells Mason it is too bad that his mother is dead since she would have been proud of her boy. This penetrates the bunco man's conscience and in a flash he sees himself as he is. Going into his partners' office he begs them to give him back the money they have taken. They laugh him to scorn. He escorts Mrs. Lewis back to the station and sees her off. On the way back to his office he determines to be through with the shady business. He again demands the money and when they refuse, he takes it by force.

A fight follows, in which he is the victor. He takes the next train for Mrs. Lewis' home that night. She is surprised to see him. Determined to make a clean breast of it, he asks for her stock which he tears up. He tells her the stock is worthless and that the National Investment Company is made up of a gang of crooks, of whom he is one. He goes back to the railroad station but discovers his capital is represented by a few pennies. Further search discloses the fact that Mrs. Lewis has slipped a bill of large denomination in his vest pocket. He puts the money in an envelope, and mails it to her. Empty of pocket, but high of purpose, he sets off for the city on foot.

A WORLD WITHOUT MEN (Three Parts).—Three charming sisters vow to one another eternal adherence to the blessing of single life. Augusta, ring-leader of the three, is particularly violent toward the sterner sex. She looks for a position, obtains several, but resigns them because of the unwelcome attentions forced upon her by various men. Meantime her sister Ethel gives music lessons in their apartment, while Clara, the third sister, a medical student, secures a position as assistant to young Doctor Squibb. In the same apartment house with the sisters lives a girl who is receiving attentions from Carl Waldeck, a young attorney. Her father has forbidden the young man to call upon her. Carl calls upon her one day and barely manages to escape the angry father. He seeks refuge in the apartment of the three sisters and entreats them to permit him to stay there to avoid his pursuer. To get rid of him they make a bridge of their ironing-board. On this he escapes through a window into another flat.

The morning after Augusta receives her answer to a position in an office of two attorneys. She makes such a good impression upon Mr. Speck, one of the attorneys, that she secures a position. Here she undergoes the same annoyances that she has received before, which only ends when she knocks the office manager down. This causes him the loss of his position.

She is now promoted to his position and requests that her former position be given to her sister, Ethel. Mr. Speck consents. Ethel makes a hit with the office clerk, Clarence Hallroom, a confirmed bachelor. He and Ethel make eyes at one another and are intercepted by Augusta, who asserts her authority and puts a stop to the lovemaking.

One day Carl returns from his vacation to his work, and is recognized as the ironing-board tourist. The beauty of Augusta has made a profound impression on him but in seeking to obtain from her a corresponding feeling he receives a rebuff. He decides to teach her a lesson. He arouses her jealousy by a flirtation with Ethel. Augusta resigns her position and leaves and compels poor Ethel to leave with her.

Clarence cannot forget her and seeks an excuse to call upon her. Freed from the grim censorship of Augusta, they shortly come to an understanding. A little later Augusta, now returning to her home, receives a call from Waldeck. As she will not admit him by the door, he enters the apartment through the window by means of the ironing-board. His eloquence sweeps away the last vestiges of her old-time man-hate, and she also becomes engaged. That very same day the charming Clara joins the ranks of the brides-to-be becoming engaged to Dr. Squibb.

PERILS OF PAULINE (16th Episode—Two Parts).—Raymond Owen still covets the Marvin fortune and still seeks the "Open Sesame" to the vast estate. Many times has he attempted to eliminate Pauline and her lover, Harry. As many times have his schemes been frustrated. To assist Owen to do away with Pauline, and acquire her fortune, Balthazar secures a position with Professor Laroux, a scientist. Laroux has just discovered the germ of a peculiar disease, one of which the patient is possessed of a mad desire to submerge himself in water. Soon after, Balthazar steals a test tube containing the germ culture and turns it over to Owen. Seeing a box of chocolates on the veranda table, Owen secretly injects some of the germ culture therein. Offering them to Pauline, he is much pleased when she eats liberally of them. Owen manages to upset the remainder on the lawn, one of which is quickly devoured by the Marvin's dog, which soon after leaps into a lake and drowns.

Harry, who has gone to his camp in the mountains, telephones to Pauline asking her to form a party and join him. Pauline immediately prepares to do so. With her friend Lucille she sets forth in her auto. Owen and Balthazar decide to engage the services of Savelli, a dope fiend and disbarred physician. They tell him that Pauline is on her way to the mountains and explain the germ episode to him, advising him that she is likely to become ill on the way. Owen tells Savelli to follow Pauline and hints that he is to see that she does not recover.

When Pauline arrives at the camp she is already in the grip of the terrible malady. Discovering water on the table, she eagerly pours out a glassful and gulps it down. Then, filling the glass once more, she empties its contents over her hands and arms. Harry notices her apparent nervousness and agitation and becomes alarmed. Taking up the telephone, he attempts to call a doctor, but is unable to connect. Owen has cut the wires. The secretary comes into the lodge and simulates surprise when told of Pauline's attack. He offers to go for a physician on his motorcycle. Instead he meets Savelli and gives him his cue. Savelli, introduced by Owen, examines Pauline and diagnoses her case as acute appendicitis. He advises an immediate operation. This Harry will not permit, which decision Savelli indignantly protests. Harry tells him that he is going to go for Laroux, the scientist, but Savelli threatens to operate in his absence. Thoroughly aroused, Harry drives Savelli into the cellar at the point of a gun. He also compels Owen and Pauline to join Savelli, as they side against him. Leaping into Savelli's buggy, Harry furiously drives away. Quickly explaining the urgent case to Laroux, Harry induces the scientist to accompany him back. Meanwhile Pauline, in her agony, rushes out of the lodge. Balthazar, discovering the plight of the three prisoners, quickly liberates them. Noting Pauline's absence, Harry demands to know her whereabouts. Getting no satisfactory explanation, Harry and Laroux commence a search. Laroux discovers the test tube dropped by Savelli and recognizes it. Suspecting that Pauline is the victim of the dread germs, he orders a search by the nearby river. Harry, mounting Owen's motorcycle, is first to reach it and sees Pauline in midstream in a canoe leaning over its sides to the water. He is horrified to see the canoe tip and precipitate Pauline into the river. Without slackening speed he dashes out on the pier on the motorcycle and plunges headlong into the stream. With swift strokes he swims to Pauline and Laroux administers an antidote to Pauline, who soon responds to his treatment. Owen, whose evil schemes have failed again, vows that he will yet be master of the Marvin millions.

WHIFFLES HAS A TOOTHACHE.—Poor Whiffles! Things certainly seem to go all wrong with him. In this amusing sketch he has a frightful toothache, and beseeches his office manager to let him leave early to go to the dentist. His request being refused, he attempts to turn the hands of the clock forward, but is caught in the act. He suffers in silence and hardly has the clock struck the hour of six than he is off on the jump to have the pestiferous molar attended to. As it happens, the dentist is busy and poor Whiffles has to wait. Now the dentist has a social engagement that evening, and forgetting Whiffles, departs to keep his appointment. After moments of waiting that seem hours, Whiffles enters the dentist's office, and finds it empty. He tries to leave the house but discovers that he is locked in. The maid has had an engagement also. The only means of egress left is by the window. He descends from it by means of a rope of sheets and falls into the arms of two waiting policemen. Haled to headquarters, he is locked up for the night, despite his protests. The next morning the forgetful dentist is called in; he remembers Whiffles and the sufferer thus is discharged with torn clothing and a black eye as souvenirs. Arriving at his office our hero finds himself late very late. In the altercation which follows with the office manager he receives a slap on the jaw which removes the aching tooth, so, minus his job and his tooth, but happy, he seeks a new market for his labors.

ACROSS THE PACIFIC (Blaney—Five Parts). Unsuccessful in his business career in the East, Mr. Escott decides to settle in Montana with his wife and little daughter, Elsie. While traveling toward their destination they camp for the night and little Elsie wanders off picking flowers. A band of Indians attack the party, kills Escott and his wife, and then set fire to the wagon, after which they ride off. Shortly after little Elsie returns, and finds her parents slain.

Lieut. Joe Lanier has been out scouting with a party of his men, and, seeing the fire in the distance, inquires what the trouble is. He discovers the child weeping over the dead bodies of her parents, and takes her up in his arms, brings her home to his mother, who takes the child under her care and protection. Lieut. Lanier gives up his command and becomes a very successful miner. Elsie grows into a charming, lovable young girl, and Joe falls deeply in love with her. A stranger named Bob Stanton, from the city, visits the town, and also seems attracted to Elsie, and she is much flattered by his attentions. Joe warns her against Bob Stanton, but the girl indignantly resents his interference. As war is declared against Spain, Joe decides to re-enlist in the service, fully convinced that his love for Elsie is hopeless. Stanton persuades Elsie to elope with him, and his scheme is almost successful when Elsie discovers that he has had a former love affair with another woman. She then realizes her mistake, and when she learns that Joe Lanier is going to the Philippines, she awakens the fact that she loves him deeply, and decides to follow him and confess this.

Willie Live, a young war correspondent, assists her in many ways, and the result is that the party embark on the transport "The City of Pekin," bound for the Orient. Elsie is disguised as a young volunteer, unknown to Joe, who has been made captain of his company. Stanton belongs to the same regiment, and in his enmity against Joe Lanier has him sent through the enemies' line to defend Block House No. 7. Joe's force is not sufficient to withstand the repeated attacks of the enemy, and he requests re-inforcements. General Lawton sends a messenger to Joe, stating that re-inforcements are on their way, and selects Elsie, still disguised as a soldier, to carry his message. After encountering numerous dangers and hair-breadth escapes, Elsie and Willie Live reach the Block House with encouragement for the besieged men, and Joe recognizes her. She explains why she has followed him in spite of every obstacle, and they are happily united. The Filipinos attack the fort and almost overcome the small band of heroic Americans, when aid comes to their rescue and the enemy is put to flight with the star-spangled banner waving over Block House No. 7.

WHEN BROADWAY WAS A TRAIL (Shubert—Five Parts). The story deals with the coming of Henry Minuet, the son of the governor of New Amsterdam, to Danvers, now Salem, Mass., for the sake of buying grain for the helpless colony that he represents. Accidentally he sees Priscilla Elliott, the daughter of Danvers' physician, and while they do not speak the same language, they love each other from the start. Though Miss Elliott is sought for by Salvation Hibbens, she does not care for him because he is helpless away from his mother's apron strings. Then, too, she cares too much for Henry Minuet, and when her father dies, Salvation's mother tried to force her to marry Salvation through threats, but fails. The mother then makes trouble for Priscilla by having her declared a witch and while she is shunned by Danvers' society, she cares little, because Henry is with her. Finally the both of them are put in prison. A messenger comes from his father to learn what has been his fate. As soon as the governor of Danvers learns the name of the prisoner, he orders him set at liberty, but he has escaped in the meantime. Because of the escape, the mayor informs the Dutch messenger that he will not have anything to do with the colony of New Amsterdam under any circumstances. The soldiers capture Henry, while Priscilla is away. But Henry manages to inform her that it is best that she go and live at his father's house in New Amsterdam. Priscilla obeys, and leaves Henry, who, in the mean-

EVEN UNTO DEATH (Albuquerque—Three Parts).—The quaint old fishing village of Galilee Harbor stretched for a mile along the uneven shore line. At one side of the harbor Gallows Hill shut off the view of the sea, and at the other side on a green slope were the bungalows of the rich summer colony. To this favored spot came the Gordons—a brother and sister.

Walter Gordon quickly showed that he had an overbearing disposition and a bad temper. A few days after his arrival he knocked down a meek little old man who had accidentally jostled him, and when others interfered they suffered the same fate. Then Jack Livingston, son of the village parson, happened along. Jack took in the situation of the big brute and the little old man. Whereupon he proceeded to do to Gordon what the latter had been doing to the other. The result was that he incurred Gordon's savage enmity.

Dorothea Gordon had rowed out to the rocks in the harbor to sketch the seals that sported in the rough water. Her boat slipped its mooring and drifted away, and Dorothea was swept off the rock by the rapidly rising tide. Had Jack not been returning from the fishing grounds she would have perished.

He took her home, and placed her in his mother's care. Walter, hearing of what had befallen his sister, hastened to the minister's house, and roughly took her away with him. After this, in disobedience to her brother's orders, Dorothea became a frequent visitor at the parsonage. One evening Gordon caught the lovers bidding each other a sweet good-night at the gate. Had Dorothea not interfered the two men would have come to blows.

Jack decided to return and induce Dorothea to elope with him. Retracing his steps he saw her sitting on the balcony in the moonlight, and climbing up to her he pressed and won his suit.

As he let himself down the village scandal monger saw him and told the girl's brother. In a towering rage Gordon started after Jack. Silently his enemy approached. With a loaded pistol in his hand the irate brother confronted his man. He fired. The bullet went wild. The two men grappled. Jack wrenched the weapon from his assailant's hand.

Jack, with an iron grip on the other's throat, threw him violently to the floor, then waited for him to renew the struggle. But Gordon never moved. John, who had heard the sounds of the struggle, appeared on the scene and found Jack bending anxiously over a dead man.

Late that night at sea, two men threw a long bundle wrapped in sail cloth from a rowboat.

The next day the sea cast up its dead. The name of Jack's boat was painted upon the canvas in which the body was wrapped. He was arrested and indicted for murder. By the aid of his brother he escaped, sailed to an uninhabited island miles from the mainland, and begun the life of solitary exile.

The searching party found his upturned boat drifting near the shore. It was supposed that he had been drowned, and further search was abandoned.

A year passed. Dorothea, from grief over the loss of her sweetheart, was but a shadow of her former self. John Livingston, realizing that the hand of death was upon her, went to the island and told his brother Jack. Together they returned.

That evening, as the sun was setting, Dorothea, weak and sick at soul, stole from her sick bed to the seashore, her heart crying out to the man whom fate had so wronged, and whom she believed was resting beneath the ocean's turbulent waters.

Her fugitive lover found her there. With a cry of joy she sprang into his arms. Their lips met—it was the parting kiss. Her eyes, suddenly grown large and wild, stared strangely into her lover's face. With a long sigh she fell back lifeless into his arms.

Jack did not hesitate. Behind him lay the mainland with its turmoil and heartaches—before him was the rolling sea. One offered life without hope the other hope without life.

Gathering his sweetheart into his arms he went out into the oblivion of the ocean's depths, just as the sun lost itself in a blaze of glory in the bosom of the Western Sea.

THE ORDEAL (Five Parts November).—Jean Renyea, living a peaceful and happy life with his mother, father and sister, is in love with Helene, a beautiful girl of his neighborhood who reciprocates his ardent affection. Pierre, a hunchback, also passionately in love with Helene, becomes violently jealous of Jean. War is declared, the young men of Jean's town enlisting in the cause. Helene urges Jean to remain with her, and he determines finally not to enlist. Jean's refusal stamps him as a coward among his townspeople. The news of his son's refusal to enlist is brought by Pierre to Jean's father, an old soldier, who takes Jean's action much to heart. He cannot understand his son's attitude in refusing to obey his country's call. Learning that Jean's actions are prompted by his love for Helene, he seeks his son and endeavors to point out to him his duty to his country. The father tells the boy of the incidents of his own career in serving his country, how, by drawing a wagon load of ammunition through the enemies' lines the tide of the battle was turned from defeat to victory.

The story arouses the son's true patriotic spirit, and he determines twixt love and duty, and regardless of his sweetheart's pleadings, finally enlists. Before leaving with the recruits Jean falls asleep, and dreams: that he is on the firing line and that his troops are hard-pressed—forced back and nigh to defeat. Nightfall brings a cessation of hostilities and the soldiers make their bivouac. Jean, sleeping, sees a vision of his father, mother and sister praying for him and his country's success, and Helene axiously awaiting his return. Pierre, taking advantage of Jean's absence, renews his attentions to Helene, who persistently refuses him, telling Pierre that she will await Jean's return, Pierre realizing his suit is hopeless. At sunrise the opposing army makes an attack. Jean's troops are forced to retreat, bringing them into the vicinity of his home. Jean's General is severed from his army, but Jean, knowing the country thereabouts, takes him to a place of safety, free from capture. Meanwhile the opposing General takes possession of the town, but furious at not being able to capture his enemy, uses every effort to locate him, but to no avail. Jean, commissioned by his General to bring aid from the main division, is pursued by the enemy's cavalry. He eludes them, and wounded, seeks refuge in his own home. He is observed entering by Pierre, who, realizing that an opportunity for revenge presents itself, informs the General of the opposing forces of Jean's whereabouts.

He is captured, after his father has given his life in his endeavor to save his son. Jean, dragged wounded and helpless through the streets, is brought before the General, who, insistent upon learning of his enemy's whereabouts, offers free pardon for Jean if he will reveal the fact. Jean refuses to act the betrayer. To loosen his tongue, the opposing General orders the arrest of Jean's mother and sister, who are brought before him, and threatens them with death if Jean does not speak. The mother and sister in turn both encourage the son and brother to remain steadfast and silent, declaring that they are not afraid to die. Jean refuses to speak, seeing which the General orders the women shot. Even this does not weaken Jean in his purpose, and as a final effort the General, learning of Jean's sweetheart, has her brought before him.

At the sight of Helene, Jean wavers and is about to betray his country, but a renewal of his will power causes him to uphold his honor and he remains silent. Helene frantically pleads and appeals to Jean to speak and save her life, declaring that she wants to live and love. Jean remains firm. His sweetheart is dragged from him, and she, too, is served as was his mother and sister. This, proving too much, Jean collapses. The general, in a rage, orders him thrown into a dungeon to await the formulation of other means to cause Jean to speak. Pierre, witnessing all these outrages, becomes terrified at the result of his work. He has seen the woman he loved killed. He becomes mad, and prostrating himself beside the body of the dead, collapses. The opposing General's superior officer, arriving in the town, learns of the cruelty perpetrated, and reprimands him.

Jean remains in the dungeon unconscious, while Pierre, who has sought out the General in a mad frenzy, is driven from the town, and wanders aimlessly away. At this time an attack is made by Jean's main army. In the conflict the opposing General is killed by an exploding shell. Rescue of Jean's superior officer is effected and the opposing forces are compelled to retreat, destroying buildings in their wake. The building in which Jean is confined is demolished, and the walls shattered by artillery fire. Jean manages to make his way to the street among the dead and dying and collapses. He awakes from his dream. Jean's folks come to his aid, and finally, after some difficulty, he recovers when he realizes that the horrible events depicted before him were only a dream.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode Nineteen Reels Thirty-seven and Thirty-eight October).—After Norton's thrilling rescue of Florence on the night of the Princess Parlova's masked ball, both he and Florence are unmolested for a time. One day he goes for a walk through the woods with his collie, Shep, while Florence is horseback riding. Both wander in the direction of a cave near the waterside where the conspirators meet. Soon afterward they find themselves in danger. While Florence is out, the Countess calls at the Hargreave mansion. As she leaves a stranger, taking her for Florence, puts a note into her hands. "It will put an end to the persecution of your father, Sidney Hargreave," he says, and turning, vanishes into the woods. The Countess finds the note is only a blank sheet of paper. She hastens to the cave, where she believes Braine and the others to be; but finds only one of the gang there, the others bing engaged in repairing, under Braine's direction, a fast motor boat at a dock a short distance away. Thither she goes to convey news of her strange experience.

Meanwhile Florence, riding through the woods, sees Shep, Norton's dog, limping painfully. She dismounts and draws a sharp thorn from his foot. After putting her riding coat under the dog, she is about to look for Norton, whom she knows is not far away, when through the trees she sees the Countess Olga descend from a taxi and enter the woods. Florence follows her. She sees the Countess stand before a cliff beside a waterfall. She fumbles a moment in a bunch of grass, as if seeking a hidden spring. The next instant a section of the rocks swings outward and the Countess enters the cave. Florence waits in amazement, and a few moments later, when she sees the Countess and another of the gang leave the cave to find Braine and the others, her curiosity being aroused, she finds and presses the hidden electric button which the Countess had pushed. The rock opens and she steps into the underground chamber of the Black Hundred.

While she is investigating its mysteries, Norton sees her horse, its bridle held by Shep, and sets out in search of her. Shep leads him to the cave, but the rock has closed again and Norton, thinking Shep has lost the scent, being perhaps attracted by a rabbit or chipmunk, pays no attention to the dog's frantic efforts to get into the cave. Instead he follows the path down to the river, thinking Florence has gone in that direction. Florence, still in the cavern, finds a subterranean stream of considerable size runs through it, by which at certain times, when the tide is right, access may be had to the cave from the river.

Hardly has she made this discovery, when she hears the rock at the entrance open, and has barely time to conceal herself in a niche in the cavern wall, when Braine, the Countess Olga and several others of the gang enter. They seat themselves at a table and by the light of a candle examine the missive which the Countess has received. Florence hears the words of the mysterious stranger repeated: "It will put an end to the persecution of your father, Sidney Hargreave."

When the conspirators have finished their consultation, one of them puts the note in his pocket and Florence, quick to seize her opportunity, deftly abstracts it. The gang have barely left the cave, when the loss of the paper is discovered, and one of the men returns for it. Florence, realizing that discovery is certain, if she remains, discards her riding boots and plunges into the stream. A few minutes later, the conspirator having discovered her in the river, drags her into a rickety craft, and begins a battle which would hardly have ended in her favor had not Norton seen the struggle from the shore. Diving into the water, and soon followed by Shep, he swims toward the rowboat. He is none too soon, for the other conspirators, seeing their companion is in difficulties, come to his rescue in a fast motor boat. Norton has hardly finished with him when they are upon him.

Then a terrific struggle ensues. After dragging Florence aboard the motor boat, both men are tumbled overboard. With three men striving to drown him, the odds are too great. Norton is about to give up, when Shep swims into the melee and soon extricates his master from danger. Gaining the motor boat, Norton drags Shep aboard and with Florence speeds away to safety, leaving the conspirators struggling in the water.

girl's subconscious mind is capable of registering impressions, the surgeon forces upon Mabel's mind the thought she is, and always has been, his daughter. The girl is possessed of this belief when she recovers. She later accompanies Major Dean to the Western army post to which he has been assigned.

Sergeant Whitney, an old soldier, is stationed at the post. The man is struck by the wonderful resemblance which Mabel bears to his daughter who, several years previous, had been enticed from her home by a gambler. Although Whitney has never seen the man, he has vowed to find and kill him. Meanwhile, Lorenzo learns what has become of his former victim. Resolved to regain her, he leaves for the West.

Arriving at the army post, Lorenzo demands that Dean surrender Mabel. Knowing the girl will not recognize the man, the surgeon allows her to comfort him. Mabel shrinks from Lorenzo in repulsion.

Suspecting the truth, Lorenzo later waylays his former victim while she is out riding and endeavors to revive in her mind the memory of her life with him. At the same instant, Major Dean is obsessed by a sense of impending danger. The surgeon gazes out of the window through a pair of field glasses. He discovers Lorenzo talking to Mabel. Aware of the man's nefarious scheme, Major Dean concentrates his powerful will in an effort to so influence Mabel's mind as to enable her to withstand Lorenzo's hypnotic influence. The girl, who had been wavering, receives the message emanating from the major's mind. It causes her to shrink from her former master with the assertion she has no recollection of the incidents he has mentioned. The opportune arrival of Sergeant Whitney prevents Lorenzo from seizing Mabel and carrying her away.

That night, Lieutenant Sibley, a young army officer who has fallen in love with Mabel, asks the major for her hand. Feeling it to be his duty, Dean informs Sibley of the girl's past. The surgeon declares it is his belief that Mabel is the daughter of Sergeant Whitney, and that Lorenzo is the man who enticed her from home. So great is his love, that Sibley vows to marry Mabel in spite of what has happened.

Unknown to the two, Whitney has overheard the story. Mad with hate, he seeks Lorenzo. Unaware of his impending doom, Lorenzo resolves to make one supreme effort to regain Mabel. Seated by his window, the man fixes his mind upon Mabel with every ounce of power he possesses. Although fast asleep, the girl's mind receives the command sent forth by her former master. As though in a trance, she dons her clothes.

Again the sense of danger overcomes Major Dean. He hastens towards Mabel's room. Just at this instant, Whitney enters Lorenzo's room. The rage-maddened father engages the gambler in a death struggle. While this combat rages, Mabel stands as though petrified.

Securing possession of Whitney's revolver, Lorenzo shoots, wounding the old soldier mortally. Although he has received his death wound, Whitney's consuming hatred gives him strength to continue the struggle. A sudden twist, and the sergeant secures a vise-like grip on Lorenzo's throat. He forces the man back towards the bed.

Mabel awakens with a start. In answer to Major Dean's anxious query, she replies that a bad dream had caused her to walk in her sleep. In Lorenzo's room, Whitney draws back from the silent form on the bed. The soldier attempts to reach the door, but his strength fails. The man staggers and crumples to the floor.

She tells him that he will wed the girl he seeks. The Gypsy hands the letter to Lady Elizabeth saying that Jack will aid her. As directed, Lady Elizabeth puts a lighted candle in her window as a signal. Lord Strangavon informs Lady Elizabeth that they will be wed immediately. Lady Elizabeth drops Jack's letter and Lord Strangavon, finding it hurries out and gives orders to search for Jack. Jack enters through a secret panel and Lady Elizabeth wants to leave at once, but he urges her to wait for the Gypsy's signal. Lord Strangavon bursts in the door and his men seize Jack. Lord Strangavon agrees to spare Jack's life if Lady Elizabeth will marry him. She consents, but he secretly orders Jack whipped. The marriage takes place and Elinor denounces Lord Strangavon. The Gypsy finds Jack in the courtyard and tells him that Lady Elizabeth and Lord Strangavon are coming. She gives him her knife and he lies as if dead. Lady Elizabeth accuses Lord Strangavon of having killed him. In an ensuing fight Jack stabs Lord Strangavon.

End of Dream.

Jack finishes posing and discovers Elspeth asleep. She awakens, and still under the influence of her dream, throws her arms around Jack. Malena enters and Elspeth explains that she has been dreaming. Eleanor and Ken become engaged and Jack and Elspeth having been "engaged for three hundred years" announce their betrothal.

THE WIFE(Biograph—K. & E.—Three Parts).—While in New Orleans, Matthew Culver introduces Lucille Ferrant, an old sweetheart, to Robert Gray, a lawyer. Lucille falls in love with Gray and when he contracts the fever, persuades the doctor to allow her to nurse him. The doctor tells Gray that his recovering is due to Lucille's nursing. Gray has grown fond of Lucille, but does not love her. Out of gratitude he asks her to marry him and she consents. While gathering flowers in the garden Lucille meets Culver. She tells him of her engagement to Gray. He begs her for one rose as a last token. He then grasps her hand and kisses her. Gray having witnessed this scene, denounces Lucille and breaks the engagement.

Gray and Culver are rival candidates for the office of United States District Attorney. They both seek the aid of Senator Rutherford. Lucille and her aunt receive an invitation to spend the winter with Major Putnam and his sister at Newport. Mrs. Ives issues invitations for an amateur theatrical and Lucille and her aunt are invited. Gray, who takes part in the play, falls in love with Helen Truman. Culver, anxious to disgrace Gray, arranges with an editor friend of his for an article to be published to the effect that Gray cruelly abandoned a woman in New Orleans. Lucille agrees to aid Culver. Culver shows the article to Rutherford who doubts its authenticity. He speaks to Lucille and she confirms the story. Senator Rutherford is also in love with Helen, and asks her father for her hand. Rutherford calls Gray in to show him the article. Gray is prevented from striking Culver, whom he believes is responsible for the story. Helen finds the paper and believes Gray has deceived her. Lucille tells Helen that Gray deserted her. Helen breaks her friendship with Gray and when Senator Rutherford proposes she accepts him.

Gray, broken-hearted, leaves for New York. He is ill when Helen marries the Senator and does not read the wedding announcement. Months later he attends a ball given by Senator Dexter in Washington and meets Helen for the first time since her marriage. Rutherford receives Gray warmly and leaves his wife to entertain him. Helen accuses him of having wronged Lucille. Gray convinces Helen that he is innocent and she is overcome. Gray prevents her from falling by catching her in his arms. Lucille, who has seen Helen in Gray's arms, informs Culver, who, in turn, tells Rutherford. The story soon becomes known and Gray accuses Culver of having circulated it. They have a violent quarrel. Culver is requested to report at the Senator's apartment after the ball. Rutherford asks Gray to follow him to his home and to bring Lucille with him. He urges Helen to retire as he has urgent business to transact. Lucille and Gray arrive and are concealed behind the portieres when Culver makes his appearance. Rutherford accuses him of having spread the falsehood, which Culver denies until he is confronted by Gray and Lucille. Lucille accuses him and he confesses. Before Gray departs he confesses to Rutherford that he still loves Helen. Helen comes down to see what is keeping her husband and he questions her about Gray and asks her if she loved Gray when she married him. She collapses.

Gray receives a telegram congratulating him on his appointment as United States District Attorney. Culver disgusted, leaves for the West Indies. The engagement of Major Putnam and Mrs. Ives and Jack Dexter and Kitty Ives is announced. Rutherford treats Helen with every consideration, but does not speak of his love. He accepts a mission to St. Petersburg and Helen, realizing that she does love her husband, begs him to take her along. This convinces him that his devotion is reciprocated and they leave together.

THE FORTUNE HUNTER (Lubin—Five Parts). Nat Duncan and Harry Kellogg are collegemates. Nat is the scion of a supposed rich family, while Harry has nothing but the expenses of an education. While Harry is in his diggings hard at work to make good in his college course, we find Nat with riotous companions of both sexes, finding two automobiles insufficient to carry the large party he is entertaining, and resulting in his arrest for stealing a trolley car and telephoning to his pal to find bail for him. However, with sufficient pride not to suffer the odium of a plucking at "exams," Nat manages to secure a degree, while Harry graduates with high honors, and begins a business career in the mercantile firm of Bartlett & Co. Nat's father dies when it is discovered that the estate is bankrupt. Harry secures for him a berth as commercial traveler with Bartlett & Co., and after a turn at expensive living, his career as a drummer is closed when he sends home an account, with expenses set at $361.20 and sales $97.50. He tries many means of livelihood, all unsuccessful. One night his old friend, Harry, rescues him from a park bench and takes him home to his own apartment. Nat, driven almost to desperation by his continued failures, is willing to grasp at any straw that will keep his head above water, and with the characteristic remark: "God help the future Mrs. Duncan," he signs a contract with Harry. This contract specifies, that he is to renounce forever, liquor and tobacco, that he must go regularly to church; that he must not swear or use slang, and that he must secure some position in the chosen village of Redville, which will afford the opportunity of meeting the heiress he is to win. The contract is religiously kept, and Nat soon causes real excitement in the town of Redville, but his abstemious habits, his studious nights, and his close attention to his religious duties are noted. But the position he must secure so as to repay Harry the five hundred dollars loaned him for working capital does not materialize and he finally applies for employment to an old druggist and inventor named Samuel Graham. Graham, in his eagerness to create fame and fortune for himself out of his inventions, has left his drug business fall into decay, and his only daughter, Betty, has grown up as the household drudge. Naturally, the old man cannot afford to pay a clerk; Nat offers to work for nothing if Graham will teach him the business. This proposition is accepted and immediately Nat developed an adaptability he had never dreamed of before. With some of his money he pays long-standing accounts against Graham which restores his credit. Lockwood, the village banker, whose daughter Nat has chosen to be the bride of his agreement, forecloses a mortgage against Graham, and Nat pays it. A party is to be given in honor of the arrival of so desirable a young man in the village. Betty has no dress to wear, and with his remaining $32.80, Nat buys that. Immediately the old prestige of the store is revived, it is filled with customers, and the old man now has ample time to work at his patents. A machine for manufacturing illuminating gas from crude oil attracts the attention of a young promotor named Burnham, who makes the inventor an offer of $500 for it, but Nat refuses to permit him to accept it. At the party given by the Lockwoods, Nat becomes engaged to Josie, the banker's daughter, and then Betty discovers for the first time that she loves Nat herself. A rival to Nat's affections is Roland Barnett, a clerk in the Lockwood bank, and he believing that the interloper must have an unsavory record, takes measures to unearth it. Nat has been very earnest in his attentions to business, and has devoted much time to the study of chemistry. When the work of both inventors demand more room, the old living quarters above the store are turned into laboratories, and a new home is secured more befitting the altered circumstances of the Grahams. Nat's invention is a death-dealing appliance which he calls an aero-grenade. Betty is unhappy in the new home for uneducated as she is she knows that she can never grace it. Nat has not the money to pay for Betty's education, but she has a rich uncle, Colonel Bohun in the village who, when Betty's mother died, was denied privilege of adopting her and has bitterly resented what he considered a slight. Nat's first meeting with the Colonel is not successful, but he finally wins over the old man and Betty is sent to school at his expense. The metamorphosis in the girl under the influences of education and young women of refinement is almost magical, and when she comes home for Thanksgiving holidays she creates a stir in Nat's soul which makes him forget everything. At this juncture Harry receives a letter setting forth the state of things, and he at once takes a train for Redville. Now Nat is unhappier than ever, for Harry refuses to release him from his singular agreement, and what is harder to bear, he takes a strong fancy to Betty himself. Meanwhile, Roland's private detective sends an old newspaper containing an account of the absconding of a defaulter, and expressing the opinion that no doubt Nat must be the culprit. Before he can make use of his discovery, however, a great calamity comes to the quiet sleepy Redville. While Nat is demonstrating his aero-grenade to some capitalists who have made an offer for that and the gas machine, it explodes setting the laboratory on fire. Graham, Harry and the capitalists escape from the burning room, but in trying to extinguish the flames meant to be unquenchable, Nat is hopelessly imprisoned in the laboratory, surrounded by flames. But the invention of old Graham proves to be a life saver in its destruction, for when the fire reaches the flas tank it explodes, blowing out the front of the building and Betty herself drags him insensible through the aperture, when men dared not venture near it. Roland goes to the Lockwoods with his evidence against Nat. It has the effect intended, for when Nat is faced by it, he refuses either to affirm or deny it, the engagement with Josie is terminated and he finds that Betty has loved him all along.

Isaac is sent to Siberia, hard work and age soon tell on him, his old bones cannot carry the load of life any longer, he falls, and the whips of the cruel guards cannot make him get back to his feet. Rachel Shapiro, a young girl, sees them whipping the poor old man and goes to his rescue. Her denunciations of the Lieutenant in charge of the Cossacks moves him to shame, and he orders him taken to his shack, and before dying, he gives a note to Rachel to take to his daughter, if she is lucky enough to get out of Siberia. Ivan Russak, whose ward is now in her 18th year, decides to send to the Convent and have her brought home. Miriam leaves for her new home, where everything that is beautiful is given her, and Ivan makes her his mistress. Rachel Shapiro is loved by Alexis Mavok, who is a Lieutenant in the Commissary Department. Alex has resigned his commission in the Russian army, and decides to join his brother in America. He wishes to take his sweetheart with him, and, accordingly, he designs a packing case, and placing her in it, with the aid of a few of his friends, she makes her escape. At the end of her journey, Rachel tells Alexis of the message to Miriam from old Isaac, and she leaves to deliver it. She is met by a party of Cossacks, and refuses to tell her destination, and where she comes from, is searched, and the tube is found on her which harbors the message from old Isaac to his daughter, Miriam, and after repeated commands to open it, and her refusal, she is being severely whipped, when Miriam, who is out for a walk, comes upon the scene. At her command they desist, and with reprimand she sends them on their way. Miriam learns from Rachel that she has a message from her father, and opening the tube Rachel gives her her father's dying words, which read:
Miriam Grunestein,

My beloved Daughter:

I learned recently that you were alive and the protege of Ivan Russak. Shun him my daughter as you would the plague, for he incited the massacre that lost me your mother, deprived me of you and made me an exile.

Your loving father,
ISAAS GRUNESTEIN.

Miriam denounces Ivan as a murderer and tries to kill him with the paper cutter on his desk. He at first tries to reason with her, but after a fierce struggle, he picks her up, and locks the door and makes her a prisoner. Miriam, through her maid, sends a note to an old rug merchant, Abraham, telling him that she is a prisoner in the home of Ivan Russak. He calls all the Jews together in a cave where they have their meetings, and they assault the Castle of Russak, and take Miriam away to where Alexis and Rachel are awaiting her, and they board a ship for America.

Eight years later, Miriam has married Feder Tomsky. A little boy has made their happiness complete. Fedor and Ivan Russak are cousins, and one day a letter is brought him, telling him of a visit of Ivan, who is being sent on a secret mission to America by the Czar, to look into a colony headed by Alexis. Ivan arrives, and Fedor brings him home to stay with his happy family. Ivan and Miriam meet; they recognize each other. Ivan continues to bother her, and one day, Fedor having to go to the village for supplies, tells Miriam that it will be impossible for him to return until after midnight. Ivan writes Miriam a letter telling her she has to leave with him, otherwise he will expose her to her husband. Miriam promises to meet him in a deserted hut that night, at nine o'clock. Miriam tells Rachel, and Rachel goes to Alexis. He goes to the Jews and tells them. They call a hurried meeting, one of the number, an expert in bombs, promises to arrange one that will go off promptly at nine o'clock that night, telling Alexis to forge a note keeping Miriam home until midnight. Alexis is off, writes the note, and gives it to Rachel to give Miriam. Miriam reads the note, but her heart is broken. Ivan leaves for the rendezvous. The Jews have arrived at the old shack, have placed the bomb in the drawers of the old table. Miriam is putting her little boy to bed. Ivan arrives at the shack. It is five minutes to nine. He seats himself on an old box and begins to smoke. The Jews are watching, there is a puff of smoke followed by a terrible explosion. They run to the scene and only the mangled body of Ivan Russak remains. They tell the news to Alexis, who starts back to tell Rachel. Fedor and the halfbreed return earlier than expected, hear the explosion, and madly gallop to the hut. Fedor finds his cousin in the ruins, they gently lift the body into the wagon and he takes it home. Miriam is ready to go to her meeting with Ivan. She is bidding her chum and mate goodbye. Rachel goes to the door and looks out. Fedor and the halfbreed are bringing in the body of Ivan. Rachel quickly shoves the half stupefied Miriam into her room. Fedor and the halfbreed carry the remains of Ivan into his old bedroom and Miriam coming in meets Fedor. There is a rush to his arms, a break down of tears. Fedor believes it is the sorrow for the death of his cousin, but Miriam knows it is the gladness of her heart.

THE SECRET OF THE RING (George Kleine—Three Parts).—Ralph Redwood's uncle dies leaving him sole heir to all his possessions, including a very large and beautiful diamond ring, under the stone of which is hidden a diagram showing the location of his wealth. Upon news of the uncle's death, Ralph telegraphs his lawyers that he will leave on the next boat. Jasper Rowels, a bad character, hears of Redwood's fortune and that night secrets himself on the boat. At a favorable moment, he hurls Ralph overboard, and taking the ring, assumes Ralph's name and stateroom. Ralph is rescued, but Jasper denounces him as the badly wanted crook, Jasper Rowels, and Redwood, having no means of identification, is placed in prison when the boat arrives.

Meanwhile, Jasper visits with a young lady on board, and becoming quite smitten with her, gives her the diamond ring, quite unconscious of its peculiar secret. Incidentally, the young pair have their picture taken with the young woman wearing the ring. When he calls on the lawyers, Jasper is amazed to be asked for the ring. He promises to produce it, calls on the young woman and learns that her handbag containing the ring had been stolen by thieves that day. In this predicament Jasper thinks of the photograph and has a local jeweler make an exact duplicate. The lawyers accept this proof of identification, and leading him to the uncle's villa, tell him that beneath the stone of the ring he will find the secret key to the hidden wealth.

Meantime, Redwood, with the aid of Rosa and her brother, two good persons with whom Redwood had become acquainted, succeeds, by swimming through a long stretch of water in escaping from the prison. He arrives in the city incognito. Jasper finding hope nearly gone, advertises a large reward for the return of the stolen ring. One of the thieves carries the ring to his villa. The young woman, passing by in an automobile on the way to Jasper's home, is seen by Redwood, who leaps on behind. Arriving at the gate, he notes the thief who has the ring, vaingloriously flaunting it in the face of a maid. A fight follows in which Redwoods gets possession of his ring. The thief follows him to the home of Rosa and takes down the address.

Finding Rosa alone some time later, the gang members, along with Jasper, seize and kidnap her. She is found to hold in her clenched hand the important diagram, although the diamond itself is still in the possession of Redwood. With the diagram, Jasper hurries to the villa. He pries open the great vault, steps inside and in an instant he is made prisoner by the slamming of the heavy door. Rosa's brother, receiving the threatening note in which her life is claimed as a forfeit unless the ring is produced, succeeds in rescuing her. Ralph Redwood, meanwhile, goes to the villa, and, with the ring, easily opens the vault door, only to stumble over the body of Jasper. Thus Redwood comes into his rights. He goes home to ask Rosa to share the fortune with him.

PARAMOUNT.

BEHIND THE SCENES (Famous Players—Five Parts).—Dolly Lane is a poor and pretty little musical comedy soubrette, rehearsing and playing day and night, living in poor lodgings quietly and meagrely, and devoted to her work and stage ambition, which are the dominant factors in her life. One night, in the final scene of the play, she and her comrades throw confetti into the audience, nearly blinding a young man who sits in one of the front rows of the orchestra. Dolly's sincere concern over the accident amply atones for it, and the young man, Steve Hunter, induces his friend, a wealthy young chap, to take him behind the scenes after the performance. There he and Dolly meet, and their romance begins. Though not a devotee to the theater himself, Steve is not long in falling in love with little Dolly, and one night, after the lights of the theater are dimmed, they are made man and wife.

One day Steve receives word that an old uncle in the West is dying and that he is to come to him immediately. Steve goes, and Dolly now gives all her heart and energy to her work, succeeding so well that when an accident happens one day at rehearsal to the leading woman, Dolly is given that exalted position and told to be ready that night. She hurries home, her heart full with the success so near at hand, to find Steve has returned from the West, the heir to his dead uncle's great wheat farm. She hears Steve's news, hardly conscious of what it means, and then quickly tells him of her own good fortune; but instead of congratulating her, Steve tells her she will have to abandon her position on the stage and go West with him. After a terrific struggle between ambition and love, Dolly yields, surrenders her career and leaves all behind her to go West. But she soon wearies of the quiet farm and Steve's seeming neglect of her for his work, and one day, revolting against it all, she returns to the city. There she finds a wealthy man only too ready to back her as a star in a new play. Trying to forget Steve, she throws her whole soul into her ambition, and the new play and star become the sensation of the theatrical season. But success without Steve to share it turns to ashes in her grasp, and when that night the wealthy producer of the play comes to her dressing room, locks the door and demands the price of her triumph, she for the first time realizes the nearness of the abyss and its yawning terrors. As she desperately plays for time she hears Steve's voice. The manager hastily gives up the key, and she admits Steve while the other conceals himself. Steve, however, learns of his presence in the room, pulls him from his hiding place, and, with one glance of scorn at Dolly, leaves without hearing her explanation. Despairing and disillusioned, Dolly resigns from the cast and takes the next train for the West. In the golden harvest fields, on a sunshiny day, she again meets Steve and tells him all, and as his forgiving arms embrace her the tawdry glitter of the tinselled past is forgotten.

WHAT'S HIS NAME (Lasky—Five Parts).—Harvey, the beau of Blakeville, a soda clerk, is very popular with the girls. Harvey marries Nellie, the baker's daughter, against the wishes of Harvey's uncle, a bachelor who is the village photographer. After three years of blissful married life, Nellie meets one of the chorus girls of a visiting show and, through her, joins the chorus. When the show leaves for New York, Nellie, Harvey and Phoebe, their little girl, go with it. During the performance in New York, Nellie makes a big hit and arouses the interest of Fairfax, a millionaire man-about-town. Nellie becomes the star of the play at a big salary. At the manager's suggestion, to keep her husband in the back-ground, she establishes Harvey and Phoebe in a house at Tarrytown, and spends Sundays there.

Harvey becomes known as "What's His Name" the husband of Nellie Duluth. In a few years, Nellie becomes the rage of New York and because of Fairfax she rarely comes to see Harvey and Phoebe. Harvey meets Fairfax and becomes jealous of his attentions to Nellie and, while leaving the theater after a short visit, he sees waiters bringing food and wine to her dressing room, and returns later only to find Nellie, Fairfax and a great party of friends hilariously supping. Harvey flourishes a revolver and breaks up the party. After Harvey returns home, Fairfax calls on him and offers him a large sum of money to allow Nellie to secure a divorce. Harvey, enraged, strikes Fairfax, whereupon the latter beat him.

The next day Nellie calls and tells Harvey that they are going to marry. They attempt to take Phoebe from him, but fail. Nellie has the furniture removed and turns them out of their home, and leaves for Reno, while Harvey and Phoebe start back to Blakeville, afoot. After several weary months, they arrive there in tatters and are taken in by their uncle, who helps Harvey to a new start. At Blakeville, he is welcomed by all his friends and takes his old job back. Phoebe becomes dangerously ill and Harvey wires Nellie. She has been disillusioned by Fairfax and comes back at once.

TOO LATE (Four Parts).—Suzanne, the daugter of a sea captain, who had sacrificed his life in defense of his country, is present at the death-bed of her broken-hearted mother. Suzanne, inheriting her father's love for the sea, is determined to go on a voyage. The sailors warn her against such a course, but she embarks in a fragile craft. A violent storm arises, and the sailors, standing awe-struck, cry: "Alas, she has joined the brave hearts that rest forever in the deep." But a stranger cries, "No, she is a woman. While you men of the sea hesitate, I will go to the rescue." It is the Prince Leander, and it is thus that he and Suzanne meet for the first time.

After the rescue the Prince calls daily to inquire for Suzanne, and is assured that she is convalescing. These daily visits bring about the inevitable result—they fall in love with each other. In the meanwhile, enemies attack his country; but the Prince, enraptured by his all-absorbing love for Suzanne, fails to respond to his country's call, and rejoin his regiment in defense of his native land. It is not cowardice that detains the youthful Prince; it is love for his maiden of the sea, whom he had so miraculously snatched from a watery grave. Suzanne realizes that though her life had been saved by Leander, yet at the same time her heart had been lost—lost to the handsome stranger, of whose rank and royal lineage she was in total ignorance. For he was heir to his father's throne, and his country's future King. So Suzanne listens to Leander's pleadings and declaration of love (supposing him to be of her own station in life), and they pledge their love through time and eternity.

Prince Leander's continued absence during the period of his country's peril caused the King and the Council of the Kingdom of Hessen to institute official espionage over the Prince's movements. The investigation is placed in charge of the Adjutant, who, after a thorough search and a careful watch, sends this message to the King: "It is a woman." Then Leander's father sets out to visit Suzanne. He tells her that her lover is not what she thinks him—a plain citizen—but that he is the heir to the throne. He admonishes her to give him up, saying: "I will compel you not only to release him from your engagement, but to write him a letter containing your farewell, now and forever. Your servant must deliver this letter to the Prince, and say that you have disappeared, and no one knows whither. For the salvation of your country, if you are devoted to it; for the future career of the Prince, if you love him; in the name of your brave father's noble life, and nobler death, I ask you to make the sacrifice and give up my son." And Suzanne replies: "For your son's sake I agree."

The Prince returns to Suzanne's home, but she is no longer there. He is handed her letter of farewell. The answer only comes when his father, suddenly at the point of death, after a royal reception and ball, repents of his action in separating the lovers. The Prince had met all the beauties of the Kingdom of Hessen, but says: "I will never marry. My heart is given to a woman far from my own country." Then, shortly before he expires, the father commands the Adjutant: "Get the letters the girl has written to the Prince—the letters that we intercepted. I will tell you all, my boy, but forgive me the great wrong I have done." Though the Prince forgives his father, yet his first official act, after ascending the throne, is to dismiss and banish the Adjutant who had acted as spy. Then Leander went in search of his lost love, and found her wandering a broken woman, a pitiful shadow of her former self, a mental and physical wreck. As he approaches her, she fails to recognize the man who, in happier days, had been all in all to her. He turns away, broken-hearted.

Epilogue.—Following the physician's advice, Leander has Suzanne sent to a convent, where she finds solace in spiritual consolation.

THE ROBBERS.—(A dramatization of Friedrich von Schiller's story of the same name.).—There is a sea of difference in temperament, desires and aspirations between Karl and Franz, the two sons of Maximilian von Moor. The older, Karl, is of a heroic type, i. e., handsome, noble and passionately in love with his cousin, Amalia, who reciprocates the tender passion. Cheerfully Karl sets out for the University, entrusting the beauty to the care of his father. Franz is a thorough villain, deformed, ugly, full of abnormal and unnatural desires, who immediately sets out to blacken Karl's character to his father, whom he has plotted to remove, by a story of seduction and disgrace. The feeble old man, to Franz's disappointment, is not killed by the news, but advises Franz to reprimand Karl, whereupon Franz writes Karl that he is disinherited.

Karl is grieved and maddened at the almost incredible injustice of his father, and yields readily to the suggestion of a comrade that he organize his schoolmates into a band of robbers to war on false society. He soon becomes the terror of the country. Even soldiers are powerless against his trusty band bent on plundering and killing.

In the meantime Franz is carrying out his diabolical plots to get rid of his father and seize Amalia, for whom he conceives a passion. He finds an unscrupulous accomplice in Herman, who conveys the news of the supposed death of Karl to the father, who is thereby thrown into a frenzy. A scuffle ensues and Franz, though he has not really killed his father, convinces the servants that he is dead. At midnight the unconscious man is brought in a coffin to a dungeon and left to starve.

The arrival and story of a new member of the band remind Karl of his beloved ones at home. He travels thither in disguise, sees his still constant Amalia, and learns of the death (?) of his father. An attempt is made by Franz to poison Karl, whom he recognizes, but it is frustrated by the faithful old servant sent to carry out the treachery.

Karl, despairing and embittered, is irrestibly drawn back into his robber life. On the midnight of the day on which he joins the band again, he discovers Herman bringing food secretly to Old Moor in his dungeon. He learns all from the unfortunate man and resolves to take revenge.

Franz is troubled by his black conscience. He has horrible dreams and sees visions. For the first time in his life he seeks spiritual guidance from a priest, but in vain. The robbers are by this time hammering away at the gates of the castle and set it on fire. The terrified Franz, anticipating his fate, commits suicide. Old Moor dies broken-hearted to see his son at the head of a band of outlaws. Amalia is captured and brought before Karl, who is on the verge of leaving the band to go with her—but alas! he is bound by his oath to the robbers. At her own request, then, Karl slays Amalia and surrenders himself to justice, giving a poverty-stricken laborer with a large family a chance to obtain the large reward offered for his head.

SAWYER.

THE FATAL NIGHT (Four Parts).—Catharine, the Queen Mother of France, urged by the noble and influential house of Guise, became jealous of the growing strength and popularity of the Huguenot or Protestant party, the head of which was Henry, King of Navarre. The wily Italian Queen of France found that to make any success in her plots against this rising party, she would have to get the main body of them to Paris, and she therefore arranged a marriage between Marguerite De Valois and Henry, the Huguenot King.

Thousands of the flower of the Huguenot faith flocked to Paris to witness the welding together of the two political and religious factions. The marriage was performed, while the Huguenots were feted and flattered until no vestige of suspicion of treachery could enter their minds.

The feast of St. Bartholomew was nigh and all was ready for the blow to be struck. The King, a weak, hysterical boy of but 23 years, tried to stop the tragedy but was overruled by his mother and gave the order for the massacre of the Huguenots on the eve of the feast of St. Bartholomew.

Never in the history of the world has a plot, known to practically every Catholic in Paris, including the scum of the streets, been kept so absolutely secret as was this one against the Huguenots. During the evening the streets of Paris were practically deserted, save for a few bands of priests and soldiers who nailed white crosses on the houses of all Catholics, to shield them from the fury of the blood-mad mob.

Nobles mingled with beggars, hiding in tenements and archways and, in fact, anywhere which would be a vantage point for the killing of the hated Huguenots.

At midnight the stillness of death spread over the city, and suddenly to the waiting thousands came the ringing of the bell of St Germaine which was the prearranged signal for the massacre to commence. For the next twenty-four hours, Paris was a charnal house.

Marie de Mornay, the daughter of a Huguenot nobleman, has been betrothed against her will to a childhood friend of the family. She loves her finance as a brother but not as a wife should love a husband, yet to save her father from financial ruin she consents to become the wife of the wealthier Huguenot noble. The two families attend the royal marriage, and there the king himself presents to her the dare-devil Catholic noble, Raoul de Tournay, a close confident of his majesty. On "The Fatal Night" he plans to save Marie's life from the general massacre, and forces her to become his wife in return for his services in saving her whole family and fiance from death. She agrees, and in a well-told story of the thrilling events of the next few days, we see how Marie learns to love her husband, whose nobility and generosity find expression in his every act, despite the harshness of his wooing.

THAIS (Loftus Features—Four Parts).—The story of "Thais" takes place in Alexandria during the early era of Christianity. Many of the scenes depicting the licentious life in Alexandria would be repellent in their realism, but for the care used by the cast in keeping all the sumptuousness possible in the picture, and eliminating everything that would be offensive. During the dominance of the fair courtesan Thais, the city was at the height of its glory.

Paphnuce, a young Roman but recently converted to Christianity, falls under the spell of Thais, who rules Alexandria's youth with an iron hand. But Thais is never constant in her affection, and when Paphnuce finds himself no longer her favorite he turns, brokenhearted, to the church for consolation. He becomes a hermit-monk, and goes into the desert to preach the gospel to wandering tribes. Five years later he has conquered himself completely, and fired with the ardor of saintliness, he returns to Alexandria to try and win Thais from her wicked ways. He succeeds in converting her, and while she loves him again, she is strong enough to control herself, and enters the convent of the White Sisters to expiate her earlier life of sin. But while he is bringing Thais to see the light, Paphnuce's own spiritual downfall results, for he finds his love of the woman stronger than his own steadfastness to Christianity. He can control himself no longer, and one night, coming into the convent, he finds Thais dying, brokenhearted, and is just in time to let her last breath on earth come while pillowed in his arms.

NELL OF THE CIRCUS (Four Parts).—Margaret, the daughter of Banker Morris, falls in love with Bob Wilson, an old schoolmate, who is now a circus performer. When Bob's show comes to town, he asks Margaret to marry him, and this she is advised to do by her cousin, Philip Lee, who knows it will result in disinheriting her, though thereby making him the heir of the wealthiest man in town. Bob and Margaret elope and, just as planned, Philip Lee finds himself the sole heir to Banker Morris's millions.

Four years later the circus again visits the town. Margaret now has a baby daughter, called "Nell of the circus," who has a devoted friend in Prinsey, the clown. Philip Lee, knowing that Margaret's father has forgiven her, offers to pay her $5,000 to waive all her rights to the inheritance. When calling on her, he meets Marie, a performer in the circus, who immediately falls in love with him. Philip, offering the settlement to Margaret, makes an insulting remark, which her husband, Bob, resents. Later Philip waylays Bob, strikes him on the head and he loses his mind. A storm blows down the circus tent. Margaret is hit with one of the huge poles and killed. Prinsey, the clown, takes charge of little Nell's birth certificate and her mother's marriage papers. Philip Lee follows the circus, and secretly marries Marie in a distant city.

A lapse of eighteen years shows that Phil has deserted Marie; she is still in the circus with a child to support. Nell is now the leading bareback rider of the show, which, under a new name, visits the village again, and Philip Lee takes Ned Tracey and his sister, to whom he is engaged, to see it. Marie recognizes her husband in the audience, and Ned is infatuated with Nell. Marie sees her husband, who tells her he cannot prove he is married to her, and threatens to have her arrested for blackmail if she annoys him.

The circus owner tries to make love to Nell; she resists him, and Prinsey comes to her aid. The owner discharges Prinsey, and Nell says, "I will go, too." To enable Marie to secure the proof of her marriage, Prinsey and Nell give her all the money they have and take charge of Marie's child. They are forced to take refuge in a barn, which happens to belong to Philip Lee, who has Prinsey arrested for trespass. Ned happens to meet Nell, pays Prinsey's fine and installs them in his housekeeper's cottage. Prinsey goes to see Banker Morris with Nell's papers, but Philip Lee meets him, secures the papers and refuses to return them. Ned discovers Nell with the baby, thinks the worst of her, and decides to give her up. Finally, however, Marie returns. Phil is forced to give up the proofs of Nell's parentage. Nell is accepted by her grandfather and marries Ned, while Marie is given a comfortable home.

MOTIOGRAPH RESULTS

SPOKEN OF IN ALL COUNTRIES

The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co.,
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen: In reference to the MOTIOGRAPH machine, I bought two of these machines in 1911 and 1912, and both of them are in perfect running order at the present day, and each doing work seven nights per week. During their life neither machine has stopped for one single night.

I consider the MOTIOGRAPH excels all other machines for projection, steadiness, and costs less. No wonder you say "Cut down your repair bills and get a MOTIOGRAPH."

Have had experience with several other machines, and I would have none other than a MOTIOGRAPH.

Yours sincerely,

Ventilating Operators' Booths

In most cities it's the law that the operator's booth be ventilated. In any case ventilation is absolutely essential for the health and efficiency of the operator. A feature of great advantage is that the fan carries the smoke away almost instantly in case a film catches fire. This prevents smoke from entering the theatre and decreases danger of panic.

The above photograph is taken on top of the operator's booth in a Philadelphia theatre. It is installed to comply with the law in that city.

Sturtevant
(REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.)

Ready-to-Run Fans

are motor driven. All that is necessary is to connect them to the source of electric power.

They are ideal for ventilating the ticket booth, the operator's booth, or can be used in connection with windows to exhaust air from the whole theatre.

Sturtevant Fans are made in all types and all sizes. No matter what your condition there's a Sturtevant fan to remedy it.

A post card will put at your disposal the largest corps of fan and ventilating engineers in the world. Ask for booklet RRW.

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

I am ZUDORA—

the mystic girl detective you've heard so much about.

I'm just eighteen. I'm playing the lead in Thanhouser's new serial photoplay — ZUDORA. This will be Thanhouser's masterpiece. It has been created by Daniel Carson Goodman, author, scientist, philosopher. It has been novelized by Harold MacGrath and will appear in 500 leading newspapers.

ZUDORA

Thanhouser's Greatest Photoplay

This stupendous production will be presented in 20 episodes—each a baffling and perplexing mystery.

These episodes represent 20 episodes of my life. Each will be complete in itself—although a master plot will run through all. A new episode will be released each week beginning Monday, Nov. 23.

I am ZUDORA—endowed with supernatural powers of deduction, hypnotism and scientific analysis.

I will present to the public, beginning Nov. 23rd, the story of my odd powers—an extraordinary recital of science, love and adventure.

I've promised exhibitors bigger box office receipts. I'll be with you beginning November 23rd to make good.

—ZUDORA

Phenomenal Growth of the UNIVERSAL

Chicago!

—Here is one of the most sensational announcements ever made in the film business. It ought to open the eyes of every moving picture exhibitor, just as it has opened our own!

—In the City of Chicago there are 523 theatres using moving pictures; some on weekly program and some occasionally. Of this number 222 right in the city alone, without counting out-of-town customers are using that Universal program!

—And there are 30 or more film exchanges in Chicago! But in spite of fierce price-cutting right and left, the Universal is getting full price everywhere!

—Just think what this means. Although over thirty exchanges are bidding for business from 523 theatres in Chicago, the Universal exchanges alone have 43 per cent. of the total business! And Chicago is one of the hottest hot-beds of film competition.

—If we had 20 per cent. it would be good. If we had 30 per cent. it would be wonderful. But we have 43 per cent.

—Heavens and earth, man, what more could you ask in the way of Proof of the Universal's Absolute Supremacy!!!

USE THE BRAINS GOD GAVE YOU!

Photographed at night!

"The Brand of His Tribe"

(101 BISON)

Shows New Universal Feat

—UNIVERSAL HAS DONE IT! Won the distinction of being the first film producer to photograph scenes in a dramatic picture AT NIGHT! Dozens of companies have tried to obtain such scenes BUT UNIVERSAL ALONE HAS SUCCEEDED. Just another Universal feat—one of a string that knows no ending and makes us feel we have used the brains that God gave us to get out the best pictures on earth. The picture of the night photography is "THE BRAND OF HIS TRIBE," a 101-Bison released in that regular Universal program Saturday, Nov. 28th. Make a note of the date and that William Clifford, Val Paul and Marie Walcamp are the stars.

Nothing like the "Animated"!

—Why are the biggest vaudeville theatres all over the country featuring "THE ANIMATED WEEKLY" on their bills and no other film? Did you know that some of them tried to tie up the "Animated" for their own exclusive use? All because genuine war views appeal to every theatregoer AND THE "ANIMATED WEEKLY" IS SCOOPING EVERY NEWS WEEKLY ON WAR NEWS WEEK IN AND WEEK OUT. But never fear—we will never restrict the showing of the "Animated" to any one set of houses; big theatre or little, the "Animated" is yours for the asking at YOUR REGULAR UNIVERSAL EXCHANGE. ASK!

"Opened Shutters" spells C-L-A-S-S!

—If you want to bring out the "class" of your community, let them know you will show Clara Louise Burnham's famous uplift story, "THE OPENED SHUTTERS," at your house. Since it is a four-reel Gold Seal (in the regular program) there are two 6-sheets,two 3-sheets and three 1-sheets for it! And the 6-sheets make up into a smashing 12-sheet! That will make it easy to "let them know"—won't it? THEN PREPARE FOR THE CLASSIEST AUDIENCE YOUR HOUSE EVER KNEW and remember the production releases on Tuesday, Nov. 17th.

PATHÉ

THE CROWN OF RICHARD III.

A 3-part drama based on history—adapted from the famous story of the princes in the Tower. Historical accuracy is combined with modern dramatic interest, and the film is steeped with the customs of the Middle Ages. A sure pulling feature—well staged, well played. 1-3-6 sheet posters.

CUPID'S PRANK

One reel comedy. Mother's idea of a suitor, father's idea of a suitor, and daughter's idea of a suitor are three different men—but all ends as it should. A barrel of fun. 1 sheet posters.

The Quest of the Sacred Gem

A 4-part American drama made by Pathé. A series of adventures connected with a jewel stolen from an idol in India and traced by priests of the temple through the United States. Mysticism combines with the most exciting action as the great gem passes from owner to owner closely followed by the vengeful Hindus. The pinnacle of intense drama. Edna Mayo, William Roselle, Charles Arling, and Ernest Truex are featured. 1-3-6 sheet posters.

IN SIX PARTS

"I am amazed! 'Julius Caesar' is to Motion Pictures what Shakespeare is to Literature. I wish every man, woman and child in Chicago could see 'Julius Caesar'."

This was the comment of Mayor Carter H. Harrison who witnessed an exhibition of "Julius Caesar," Friday, October 30th.

Yet it's the mere echo of all who have seen it. Exhibitors are clamoring for early dates, editors for photographs, colleges for private exhibition. Never before has any Motion Picture been so widely welcomed. We've merely said "It's greater than 'Quo Vadis?'!"

"JULIUS CAESAR" features Anthony Novelli in the title role. He is supported by a cast of 20,000 people. A single scene measures 276 feet. It presents a picture of massed humanity, the like of which was never before recorded on a roll of film.

"JULIUS CAESAR" will be ready for booking about November 10th. See the Kleine Manager nearest you for an early date and cash in on dramatic reviews. We will furnish a complete line of "publicity helps."

WHAT COULD SHE DO?

A Drama. By GERTRUDE LYON

Sylvia Fairfax, a young graduate, upon the death of her father is brought face to face with the hitherto unthought of problem of earning a livelihood. Brought up in affluence she is bewildered by the sudden change of circumstances. She answers an advertisement for a governess and secures such a position in a well to do family only to discover soon, that she is utterly unable to control the children of the family. She is discharged and seeks the city, bag in hand. Her varied experiences in the ordinary boarding house, then in a Department Store lead to a thrilling climax in the Police Inspector's office. She is at last acquitted of theft and engaged as a detective on the police force. Her first case—one of kidnapping—proves what she could do, for she outwits the kidnappers and wins back the stolen child. A thrilling reel.

In three parts. 3000 feet. To be released Friday, November 20th.

Facts and Comments

MANY and various are the trials and tribulations of the exhibitor who is trying to do his best. Not the least interference comes often from their financial "backers"; men without the slightest knowledge or experience in the profession of exhibiting motion pictures, but nevertheless firmly wedded to the belief that they know all about it. Then there are other troubles. One of our friends and readers relates a curious difficulty. The owner of the building in which he conducts his motion picture theater insisted on having the theater named for a close relative, and when the exhibitor failed to comply with his wish he used his political power to antagonize the exhibitor. Being a member of the local board of education, he began to agitate against the attendance of the school children at the motion pictures. This is all the more contemptible in view of the liberal attitude of our exhibitor who gave special exhibitions to the children without any charge whatever. The local board of education objects to these free shows on the strange ground "that the children will be kept guessing as to when the free show will be put on, and the result is that they are always wrought up over the matter." A circular of protest against the free show was sent to all the parents in the town, and it was declared "that the free show is almost their (the children's) sole topic of conversation, and they are constantly besieging their teachers to know when the free show will occur." As a result of this protest our exhibitor has discontinued the free shows.

AMERICAN producers of motion pictures or manufacturers of machines and supplies who may be ambitious to enter the South American market will do well to bear in mind that if the owner of the trade-mark does not register it in most of the Latin-American countries any other person may do so, thereby acquiring the exclusive right to the trade-mark notwithstanding the fact that the real owner may have used the mark for a number of years. European manufacturers and exporters have realized this fact in the past and make it a point of complying with the domestic laws of these Latin-American countries. Many American manufacturers, however, do not appear to be fully aware of the conditions under which the trade-mark rights are acquired and have come to feel that the governments of these countries condone or legalize the piracy of their trade-marks. In one extreme case in Cuba the agent for a large American concern took over the agency of a competing concern and used his ownership of the trademark of the first concern to kill any possible competition by them. The registration had best be done through American residents, as instances have occurred where native firms have registered the trade-mark of their principal in their own name and then confiscated the goods consigned to them.

IT WOULD ill behoove a mere writer to question the mental processes of the chief censor of Pennsylvania, but we really would like to know by what authority Mr. J. Louis Breitinger has forbidden the use of any paper which exceeds a three-sheet in size. A very careful perusal of the statute reveals absolutely no provision or even the trace of a provision conferring any jurisdiction over the size of posters on the censor board. When Mr. Breitinger sends out such a ukase signed by his chief clerk and "approved" by him, he is acting without even the semblance of any warrant of law. We hope the Pennsylvania exhibitors will take issue with him on this point and ask the court to put him in his place.

AN EVIL with which American statesmanship has wrestled for many years with rather indifferent success is gradually yielding to the influence of the motion picture. The fact that the motion picture theatre is a natural enemy of the saloon has been observed and commented upon quite frequently. Heretofore this influence was most noticeable in rural communities and in small cities, but recently this splendid effect of the motion picture has been observed in the Borough of Brooklyn. Slowly, but surely, the saloons in Brooklyn have diminished. No doubt the same process is going on wherever the motion picture grows. The oft-repeated remark that the saloon was "the poor man's club" may be classed among the superstitions of the past.

Forbidden Themes

By W. Stephen Bush.

I NEVER go to a library without a feeling of awe and reverence. The winnowings of a thousand precious intellects repose on shelves and tables; a decent silence reigns. There is none of that haste which mars the dignity of every human act.

If you lack faith in human nature and if in the pursuit of ideals in the world of moving pictures you are often bored by what is commonplace, sickened by what is vulgar, and offended by what is nasty and abhorrent, a few minutes in a small or great library will prove a soothing solace. Take any library you choose anywhere in this world and take your stand in the center of it blindfolded and you will presently discover a most remarkable fact, bound to fill you with new faith in human nature and with new hope in the higher destiny of the motion picture. I care not in which direction you turn groping here or there, you will find nothing but what is clean and sound and useful, or in the old philosophers' favorite definition, nothing but what is good, true and beautiful. The library contains the choice of the ages. In the course of the centuries all abnormal and abhorrent things, all fads and freaks, all crazes and manias disappear into the sewers of time. Of human follies, whether literary or social or otherwise, we have but the scantest records and even these scant records are hard to find and seldom looked for. Every century, nay every decade, has its own peculiar follies, but they leave little trace while the really valuable contributions which every age adds to the progress and civilization of mankind endure and take their place in the great storehouse of human knowledge and human power.

In these latter days, the stage and the screen have suffered not a little from attempts to improve and purify mankind by dragging into the open and spreading upon the film for public exhibition, the repellent and horrible phenomena which are either incident to human life or have been the distressing concomitants of modern civilization. This aberration of the human mind has been caused in large part by the foolish conceit of little minds. We believe our age to be the most progressive in the history of the world, but with all its advantages the modern reckless and ill-directed spirit of inquiry is constantly leading to all kinds of absurdities. The race of long haired men and short haired women seems particularly conspicuous at this time, and one of their most recent delusions is the idea that the breed of men and women can be improved exactly as the breed of dogs and horses. Hence has arisen a strange theory often referred to as eugenics which in its last analyses seems nothing more than advice to the Almighty on how to run the universe. Some ebullitions of this crude conceit have found their way to the screen. In one state we believe an opinion of this sort has actually been written into the statute books.

The moving picture art owes it to itself to protest against the exploiting of these theories in supposedly dramatic fashion upon the screen. Many literary, even highly gifted men, uncommonly skillful in the mastery of words and experts in dramatic construction, have done little more than waste their talents whenever they attempted to drag the repellent and disgusting either upon the printed page or upon the stage. The nature of the subject forbids success. The sound taste and judgment of mankind rejects the public exhibition of such features. Where such subjects are touched by clumsy amateurs a double crime is committed, one against art and the other against the commonly accepted canons of decency. After all, the difference between the theatre and the clinic is fundamental.

It has frequently been urged both by the makers and sponsors of these offensive films that evil is portrayed in all its hideousness in order that good may follow. Far be it from me to question the sincerity of these claims. No man has the right to judge the motives of another. We are only concerned with facts and results, not with theories and arguments. Nothing, therefore, is easier than to dispose of the claim that offensive films may be made to serve a moral lesson. This very contention was recently made in a court of justice where the exhibitor of an offensive film had been summoned to defend himself against a charge of "obscene and indecent exhibitions." The learned justice, to whom this specious plea was addressed, replied that the beauties and benefits of sanitation need not be illustrated and brought home to the public by uncovering the sewers and inviting the public to watch the disposition of garbage and refuse. These words fairly summarize the sound and general opinion held by the vast majority of normal mankind. We have outlived this superstition as we have outlived many others. It used to be a favored theory of good and well intentioned people, "pillars of society," that the legal killing of a man or woman in public had a wholesome and deterrent effect. It was admitted that the spectacle was hideous, offensive and gruesome, but the claim was made in all sincerity, no doubt, that the supposed moral effects outweighed the obvious horrors of the spectacle. The public whipping post and all its brutalizing influences were ardently defended on the same unsounded theory. To-day no man in his senses would dream of advocating a return to public executions. Even the portrayal of such horrible affairs upon the screen has been justly forbidden by law in some countries and rejected by public taste and decency in every part of the Christian world. The proper motion of mankind is upward not downward forward, not backward. We verily believe that the motion picture is the most valuable factor, not only in amusing, but also in educating and uplifting mankind. To the friends of the motion picture, the spreading of offensive matter upon the screen is nothing less than desecration.

In the much despised Middle Ages there lived and flourished in Florence a painter known today by no other name than Fra Angelico (the angelic friar). This good and gifted man had a most kindly opinion of his fellows. He saw only what was divine and spiritual in the faces of men and women around him. This cheerful optimism characterized all his paintings. The millions who have looked upon the figures he has left on canvas and on the walls of churches have noticed probably, with varying emotions, that all his men and women seem like angels rather than like men. In the forum of art, Fra Angelico must be censured as well as praised. He saw nothing but good and nothing but light. In refusing to see what was evil and dark, he failed in the art of true and complete expression. If art is to be an expression and reflection of human life, we cannot award unqualified praise to a series of idealized figures and faces. The stage and the screen especially, more so than literature, painting or sculpture, must show forth the fact that life is a struggle and that forces of good contend for the mastery of this world with forces of evil. However much, therefore, we may admire the sweetness and gentleness in the good Friar's paintings, we cannot accept them as artistic in the fullest significance of that word.

Two Secrets of Success

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

HUNDREDS of thousands, if not millions, of dollars are invested in production and distribution of moving pictures, where returns are wholly inadequate. This is true of concerns as well organized as brains and experience can make them, conducting all branches of the business on an extensive scale. Men discuss the unsatisfactory situation in board meetings, behind closed doors, and pace the floor in silent study of the problems involved, always fastening attention on one or two departments of a complicated machine. One trouble is that they do not give due consideration to changes that have taken place since those golden days, when it was comparatively easy to market pictures of mediocre quality, before artistic competition had made itself felt. Those days are gone never to return—1914 ushered in one new era as 1915 will another. Success is becoming a question of keeping up with the times.

Every change that has taken place has been foretold in these columns, sometimes a year or more before it occurred. This is not astonishing—one can easily determine the evolution of a new art by the development of older ones—but it is remarkable that men investing enormous sums of money should give so little attention to what is said in the papers. They have, in some cases, come to regard the press as mercenary and corrupt, incapable of disinterested and honest views, merely a tool to be bought and used for publicity purposes. Such ideas lack justification and are most injurious to the mind entertaining them. There may be corrupt writers, but the combination of intelligence and poverty is too often the result of fearless honesty to need comment.

Any man engaged in making and marketing moving pictures could have benefited largely by studying comments on successful releases or even by studying those releases through his own eyes, especially if he is not largely successful. The whole enterprise has taken on a different aspect this year. There is less demand than in days gone by for plays of purely mechanical execution —they need to be more than the work of competent journeymen. Much of the scientific work in mediocre plays is excellent, but those which rise above mediocrity contain all that has been gathered in the way of experience in co-ordination with something that makes a profound impression. That something is the missing cogwheel. The producer who is in dead earnest may set it down as true that a common human failing, vanity, is responsible for the loss of thousands of dollars in feature plays and a loss to the whole art as well.

Vanity is responsible for the director who imagines that he has something to communicate more deserving of attention than anything mere authors have written. If a director has something new, something true, something worthy of attention to communicate, his desire is laudable, but there is no way of determining this until he has tried it on the screen—he is rarely willing to submit his ideas in scenario form to disinterested critical scrutiny, as an author has to do. The director is in the same position as a publishing house manager—he has an opportunity to rush into print at the proprietor's expense. The director's motive is a natural one—it is that of advancing his own fortune, or maybe a desire of distinction, or perhaps a sincere desire to communicate some pet idea. He succeeds when he is a great genius. He fails utterly as a rule and those who foot the bills have to count the cost.

A man who goes into this business in dead earnest will not only have some definite objective, but will try to qualify in one special line of work, before he attempts to get beyond that specialty into another. We all know what Griffith can do today, but he gave strict attention to directing plays when he was building a reputation and contributing materially to the development of this new art of ours. He bought plays of authors. He encouraged authorship at a time when other producers regarded it as a mere waste of money to pay for a scenario. Some producers cling to that idea yet, and they wonder why time and money spent liberally in other directions fail to bring in the desired profit. Griffith believed that the work was composite and in distributing both the honors and the pecuniary rewards among all participating in production including those whose creative imagination provided the dominant idea.

The investor is more at fault than anyone he employs. He puzzles himself as to what old play he will revive, what old star he will present in pitiful contortions on the screen, what lurid paper he will use as bait, what expenditure he will make in general publicity, without arriving at any definite answer entirely satisfactory to himself. How, then, can it be satisfactory to others? A mind confronted with such a host of bewildering questions and clouded with apprehensions about the result cannot see what is obvious to those observing all kinds of plays, writing about them in critical reviews and noting their effect on the general public. The producer does not get at the essence of success because he focuses attention upon important details instead of the whole work.

It will eventually become clear that one essential to success lies in the imaginative power and virile endurance of the play itself, a work of pure authorship, of special skill, of undivided enthusiasm. A man must put his whole heart and soul into the play he devises—he must unfold new sources of pleasure—he must enunciate much that has not gone stale in previous presentations—he must do all this from the resources of a well trained mind. As a revealer he must have learned what is worth knowing. Why should any screen portrayal make a hit with millions of intelligent people unless it is a splendid accomplishment in one way or another? To make a great hit, it should be a splendid accomplishment in all respects, with not one cogwheel missing.

Such is the importance of unity in a work of art that its harmony, even its esthetic value, and surely its commercial value, rests on its initial design. What can we portray on the screen that stirs in the soul of humankind a desire not yet satisfied and, at the same time, give that desire a measure of moral or intellectual relief? A great deal that seems barren in literature, that is not wholly satisfying on the stage, may be vital and full of meaning on the screen. A great deal is there to delight or to spiritualize which may be exquisitely revealed through a photodrama of logical structure and fine esthetic appeal, or realized through action and situation that stir profound emotions. This new art is simpler in its appeal, more direct, fresher, sweeter and more natural than many of the old ones. What is most needed to perfect it is not only what shall make it still more lovely to the eye, but also more satisfying to the mind. We began with what was little more than impersonation. Through it we have reached representation. If we are not only to see with the eye, but through it, we must advance to revelation.

Charles Pathe, Film Publisher

Pioneer Manufacturer Announces His Intention to Call on the Best Producers for Negatives.

By George Blaisdell.

THE career of Charles Pathe marks one of the romances of the film business, as it constitutes one of the triumphs of the New Art, both on the artistic and on the practical, the manufacturing, side. Nineteen years ago Mr. Pathe had no employes; his knowledge of photography was the most meagre; the volume of his business was necessarily negligible. On August 1, at the outbreak of the European war, Mr. Pathe was doing an annual business of 70,000,000 francs. His employes numbered 7,000. A great many of these are now at the front. Of a large number not a word has been heard. On the date mentioned not only was Mr. Pathe marketing all over the world pictures produced in the United States, England, France, Spain, Germany, Austria, Italy and Russia, but he was as he still is manufacturing the virgin film, the raw stock as we in the United States term it, on which these subjects were photographed and distributed.

The conflict on the Continent has made a difference in Mr. Pathe's plans. Exhibition of pictures in France, in Belgium, in Germany, in Austria and, in a measure, in Russia, has been seriously affected where the theaters have not shut down completely. There have been rumors in the trade that Mr. Pathe intended to retire from business in the United States, even to the extent of disposing of his finely equipped studio in Jersey City. It was to obtain an authoritative expression from Mr. Pathe himself that the writer went to Jersey City. He found the manufacturer at his desk—and it was of enormous size—on the second floor of the studio. At the opposite end from Mr. Pathe was seated Hedley M. Smith, vice-president of the company. The room was a spacious one, great windows flooding the apartment with light from the north and east. The sanctum of the head of Pathe Freres is removed from the other offices of the concern, insuring absolute quiet. The atmosphere seemed a thing apart from that of the directing center of a great film manufacturer and more nearly resembled the surroundings of a publisher of books. Which right here recalls that Mr. Pathe is, to use his own expression, a publisher of films.

Mr. Charles Pathe.

"Mr. Pathe," asked the World man, "would you care to tell the exhibitors of the United States your intentions as to the future—as to whether or not there will be any lessening in the amount of your production?"

"I am going to continue business in the United States," responded the manufacturer. "Not only am I going to continue, but I am going to do more than ever before. Yes, as to Eclectic, I am going to take a greater interest in that company, too. As you know, business in Europe is quiet. I am simply taking advantage of that fact to come to the United States and work here."

"Wherever there is idleness or inaction Mr. Pathe is not contented," suggested Mr. Smith. "The absence of opportunities for work in Europe is oppressive to him. He prefers to be in the harness, to be occupied."

"Yes," continued Mr. Pathe, "the present upset in France has seemed to me to afford a splendid opportunity, one that for many years I have desired, to study American conditions, to get acquainted with the American market, with matters generally in the picture making business here—in fact, to complete my education as regards American business, because I have always looked upon the American market as the most important in the world.

"You ask me if my pictures have not always been popular in this country. Certainly I have tried to make them so, and I have strong hopes they will be more so. To attain that most desirable end I shall devote much time to watching, to following, in the theaters what kinds of subjects most thoroughly meet with the public approbation and also to completing my own organization here that I may the better meet the requirements of the time.

"It is true that we did some little while ago disband some of our companies. This action was taken because we desire to make a choice from the best artists in the world. I want to call on the best producers of negatives. By no means is it my intention to restrict my activities to my own studio here. I adopted this policy in Europe two or three years ago, with very great advantage to the business and to the producers themselves. One of my reasons for doing this is that it results in obtaining a greater variety of subjects—they are more eclectic, if I may use the term. Another reason for this step is that I want to give all my time to the business side of my firm's affairs as distinguished from the artistic, the producing, side. I mean by that that I may have more opportunity for following up the larger questions, among which above all is the matter of quality."

"Personally, I have always felt that the American picture-going public is under great obligation to the Pathe firm," said the writer. "My recollection is that in the early days Pathe was the first to make use of elaborate interiors and generally to stage pictures in advance of its American contemporaries—that Pathe was the pioneer in showing the possibilities."

Mr. Pathe smiled and was silent. He looked across the table at Mr. Smith.

"When Mr. Pathe bought his first kinematograph virgin film," said the vice-president, "the kinematograph business was not known in America. The Americans who were making raw film did not know what he was using that film for. One of your great raw stock manufacturers came to Europe to study and learn what was being done with the film. That shows how much France was in advance of America in the kinematograph business at that time.

"Mr. Pathe is now not only producing pictures, staging them, and renting them through the Eclectic, but he is manufacturing his own virgin film, and nine-tenths of it is non-inflammable. Yes, it is true that the experience he had gained as a producer and an exploiter of pictures greatly aided him in the manufacture of virgin film. He very quickly mastered the manufacture of the latter because he had to use the product in his business. Naturally he uncovered defects and immediately applied himself to correct them. He made wonderful progress by reason of his unique position.

"Non-inflammable film today is every bit as durable as celluloid and has a great many advantages that the latter does not have. For instance, it does not scratch so easily, it is more transparent than the celluloid, it is just as supple as ordinary film and no more breakable."

"It is only in America where we do not now exclusively use non-inflammable film," said Mr. Pathe. "Every one of the European countries employ 90 per cent. of non-inflammable stock. Many of them use nothing else. In most of the towns of France, Belgium and Holland the use of celluloid film will be forbidden from about June or July of next year. In England recently a committee of the House of Commons, after an inquiry lasting three months, recommended to Parliament the passage of a bill making the use of non-inflammable film obligatory; and if it be impossible to accomplish this, that theaters using non-inflammable stock be exempted from all restrictions now imposed on account of the inflammability of films.

"Coming back to the subject of pictures, I want to say it is our belief that no one firm can supply a complete program. We do not think it possible to obtain sufficient interest and variety except by calling in the aid of outside producers if you want to get the best and the biggest variety of ideas. We have found our best artists prefer to work for us in that way, because they can earn more money than when they are working for us on a straight salary. There is Max Linder, for instance—yes, we are all glad to hear he is all right—who earned as an employe about $8,000 a year, but who is earning at least $60,000 a year as a producer. He is responsible now for the production of all his own pictures. Mr. Linder may not be so well known in America—oh, I am mistaken? I am glad of it—but in Europe we have only to announce a Linder production to obtain a flood of orders.

"It is my belief that the kinematograph business is going to develop into purely and simply a matter of features and information. By the latter term I mean subjects of a topical nature, like the weeklies and dailies. I believe the time is coming when exhibitors, instead of following a stated program, will adopt the policy obtaining abroad—that they will select their features in the open market. It is my opinion that in the future producers will not attempt to do as at present—to produce a subject every week or every two weeks; they will no more think of doing that than would a dramatic author attempt to produce six plays a year. By carefully studying what they are going to do, in the execution of the work as well as in the scenario, I am sure they will earn far more money than they do under the present system and, what is of real importance to the public at large, the quality of the output will be greatly enhanced.

"My intention is to become a picture publisher or editor—to publish films as others publish books. I accept negatives where they accept manuscripts. My conception of the future of the kinematograph business is that there will be authors, producers, publishers, renters, and, of course, there will be theater showmen, the exhibitors of films. We are going to specialize more and more. My arrangement with the producers of films will differ from that of the publishers of books in this important respect, that instead of offering an unknown and uncertain percentage of the profits to the producers I shall give them 50 per cent. of the gross receipts from the hirings as their part of the transaction."

Mr. Pathe had left his chair at the great desk and was walking about the room. He was thoroughly in earnest. "The imagination plays such a great part," the manufacturer continued, "that it may be a gentleman who is gifted for that particular thing may have an idea for a scenario which can be produced for two thousand dollars. It may bring him a hundred thousand. I will certainly find more variety in calling upon every producer of films than in remaining in just a little circle of my own which may be relatively restrained and restricted, that is to say, among the present manufacturers of kinematograph films.

"I believe every effort of the editors or publishers of films must be to look out for good authors, for great authors. I would like to see writing for the screen such men as your late Mark Twain—men of genius. The highest interests of the kilematograph business demand the best quality obtainable."

Screen Club of San Francisco

Will Give Big Ball at Coliseum on November 28—Prominent State and City Officials to be Present.

THE plans that have been under way for several weeks for the formation of a social club in San Francisco to include film exchange men, exhibitors, authors, and all connected with the motion picture industry were consummated on the evening of October 19, when a meeting was held in the assembly hall of the Phelan Building, and the Screen Club of San Francisco was formally organized. The objects of the new organization are to bring out a better acquaintance of persons engaged in the industry and to promote sociability, protection and good fellowship among its members. Temporary offices have been opened in the Investors' Building at Fourth and Market streets, and as soon as possible clubrooms will be fitted up at some convenient location.

A full list of officers was chosen as follows: President, Sid Grauman, manager of Loew's Empress Theater; vice president, Charles Stillwell, manager of the Silver Palace Theater; secretary, N. K. Herzog, of the Pastime Theater; assistant secretary, R. L. Marks, of the Acme Theater; treasurer, J. T. Turner, of Turner & Dahnken. Directors: Joseph Huff, Tom North, O. V. Traggardh, R. L. Marks, A. Goldberg, Sol Lesser and F. L. Hudson.

Plans are now being made for a grand ball to be held at the Coliseum on November 28, the proceeds from which will be devoted to fitting up the new clubrooms. Mayor James Rolph has promised to attend this event, and others who will be on the reception committee include Governor Hiram Johnson, Congressman Julius Kahn, Senator E. W. Wolfe, Congressman Joseph R. Knowland and others. Preparations are already being made for advertising the event in a distinctive manner, and a heavy attendance is assured.

The club has a charter membership of fifty. The organization is working in perfect harmony with the Exhibitors' League of San Francisco, two of the directors in the latter body holding similar positions on the directorate of the Screen Club of San Francisco. It is anticipated that the membership will be more than 100 by the time the clubrooms are established.

Charles M. Seay

ONE often hears that the Southerner is lazy, that he is not strong when it comes to hustling. It may be so in his native haunts, but when he comes North he is a different proposition. The swamps of Mississippi, the coves of Tennessee, the cane breaks of Alabama, the mountains of the Carolinas, and the jungles of Georgia have all sent their quota to this great metropolis, and their sons today are found in every business in this big city, and among the leaders of their fellows. In the motion picture field there are a number from south of the line of "hot biscuits and light bread." One is particularly well known, and he is Charles M. Seay, actor, author and producer. Nearly six years ago he walked into the Edison studio, took his chances with those that drifted in, and of all the flotsam and jetsam that floated by he is among the very few that lodged. His schooling on the legitimate stage, and a natural liking for the silent drama fitted him for the position that he now holds. Born in Atlanta, Ga., he attended the University of the South, and lived in that section until his majority. He became well acquainted with the characteristics of typical small-town American life, such as he has become famous for portraying in the pictures that he likes to make best. Four years in stock with the Proctor houses in New York City, five years in vaudeville as a headliner, and with some of the best combinations on the road, is an experience to be greatly desired. The five-reel "Fantasma," from the famous Hanlon Brothers' production that the Edison studio is about to release, is the most pretentious effort of Charles M. Seay. He has scores of educational, dramatic and comedy subjects to his credit.

'FRISCO'S WAR ORDINANCE IN SUSPENSE.

No action is to be taken by the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco on the proposed ordinance against showing war films for at least thirty days, but in the meantime a close watch will be kept on theaters to see whether exhibitions of such pictures cause disturbances. In case no trouble is created no attempt will be made to secure the passage of the measure.

PRESIDENT LAEMMLE GOES TO COAST.

Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, left New York on Thursday, November 5, for a visit to Universal City. Mr. Laemmle will inspect the nearly completed West Coast studios and will take up plans for the extension of Universal's activities.

Washington Ball Great Success.

More Than Three Thousand Fans Greet Photoplay Actors and Actresses at Nation's Capital City.

By Clarence L. Linz.

MORE than three thousand people turned out to greet and meet their photoplay favorites at what has proven to be the most successful ball ever held in the National Capital, and the enthusiasm grew as the evening wore on and the visiting actors and actresses mingled with the Washingtonians in the grand march and later in the individual dances.

William P. Herbst, President.

In the opinion of all Convention Hall never looked more beautiful than it did on this occasion and the committee was highly gratified at the words of praise that came from everywhere. Flags of all nations and bunting of our own national colors, with arc lights, palms, ferns, and other potted plants and cut flowers, artistically arranged by George C. Shaffer, formed a brilliant setting for the handsomely gowned women and well-dressed men. Although a public ball and strictly informal, the affair soon became almost as a family gathering and everyone aided in making the evening one never to be forgotten.

The evening started with a concert by an orchestra of fully fifty pieces, which rendered not only the popular airs but the classics, which produced more applause than the former, so well were they handled. Then came the first dance numbers, followed by the announcement by Julian Brylawski that the photoplay stars had arrived on the Congressional Limited from New York and would be in the hall within a very few minutes. To say that this statement was applauded would be putting it mildly for the laity were on edge to see in the living flesh those who appeared nightly upon the screens of the theaters which they patronized. The first to arrive was Romaine Fielding, whose welcome was a royal one, and then quickly followed all of the other stars to the number of fifty-two.

These guests were escorted to the platform by Fulton Brylawski, the local secretary and national vice-president of the league, who had gone to New York to accompany them on their trip southward. Collectively they were given a great ovation and a rush was made toward the flower-banked stage.

The real noise began when Mr. Brylawski commenced the public introduction for the enthusiasm broke all bounds when greetings were acknowledged by each actor and actress with a few well chosen words. Everything was lovely until a crash of wood was heard and Hughie Mack was seen to give a leap forward; the big favorite had been standing so long in one place watching the merriment on the floor, that, resenting the great strain placed upon them, several of the boards of the stage groaned, then broke, but nothing serious happened.

The orchestra, upon being given the high sign, began to grind out music for the grand march and, headed by Clara Kimball Young and Earle Williams, escorted by Dr. William P. Herbst, president of the Washington league, the stars paired off and were followed by the exhibitors and their ladies and the other participants in the affair. The line of march took them before the big arcs and Lou Simons who presided at the camera. This feature created much merriment and the catchy music started something that almost ended in a cake walk. Dancing was then indulged in until twelve o'clock. Confetti and streamers filled the air after the arrivel of the players and a number of the local guests appeared in costume in true All Hallowe'en spirit.

At the conclusion of the ball about one hundred or more of those present repaired to Harvey's where the banquet was staged and where the fun was continued until a very unseemly hour for staid old Washington. After seats had been found, they were told to look pleasant and the photographer did the rest. No sooner had the smoke of the flashlights faded away when a second contingent of exhibitors and their guests made their appearance and helped to swell the party. Novelty paper hats of all descriptions were distributed around the tables and donned by all; Hallowe'en favors were given out and finally came the horns with which the diners made a racket that could be heard in the rotunda of the Capitol, more than a mile away.

Harry Crandall, Treasurer.

Papier mache skeletons were among the favors, but regardless of this and the fact that there were several varieties of "spirits" present, the banquet hall in no wise resembled a graveyard. This was evidenced by the fact that the toastmaster gave up his job as a bad one; no one had any time to spare for the making of, or listening to speeches, no matter what the text. Fulton Brylawski was given a half-minute in which to make the announcement that Geo. Smiley would preside as toastmaster; the latter was given an opportunity to propose a toast "To our hosts of this evening, with the hope that we will again have the pleasure of seeing them in the very near future." The toast was made a double one for the sentiments expressed by Mr. Smiley were in kind those of the Washingtonians.

Dr. Herbst delivered his address of welcome in about thirty seconds and his popularity was voiced in the loud applease which followed. National President Pierce was given an equally hearty welcome. "Never in my life have I been happier than on this evening," he said. "The pleasant affair takes me back to the time we had the great honor of entertaining you all in Baltimore, and that which perhaps makes me happier still is the fact that we will shortly invite you to again visit us. One word more in conclusion. When the toastmaster made the toast to the Washington exhibitors, I am sure he voiced the sentiments of those of Baltimore; never have we had a grander time than we have had here." In closing Mr. Pierce presented to the local league "a little souvenir of the good times we had at our Dayton convention," a frame containing several photographs of the attendants at the convention and the ribbon and metal badges there distributed.

Fulton Brylawski, Secretary.

A few of the photoplayers were allowed to make "we're glad to be here" remarks, and the dinner was continued. After the coffee was served, those who were not tired of dancing went to the small ballroom on the floor above where a stringed orchestra was kept busy until the wee sma' hours. The milkmen were making their daily rounds when the photoplayers were piloted to the Hotel Raleigh where suites of rooms had been engaged for their accommodation, and the natives wended their way to their several suburban villas, tired but extremely happy in the thought that they had participated in a history-making event.

Among the photoplayers present were Anita Stewart, Kate

Price, Mary Maurice, Norma Talmadge, James Morrison, Dorothy Kelly, Rose E. Smith, Edith Storey, Romaine Fielding, Earle Williams, Wally Van, Donald Hall, Lloyd Lonergan, George Smiley, Ben Wilson, Justina Huff, Lillian Walker, Leah Baird, King Baggot, Florence Hackett, Ormi Hawley, Edgar Jones, Louise Huff, Rosellee Brice, Hughie Mack, Harvey Myers, Rosemary Thiele, Ralph Ince, Mabel Trunnelle, Miriam Nesbit, Robert Conness, Marc MacDermott, Gertrude McCoy, James Young, Kempton Green, A. H. Smith and others.

The Baltimore contingent comprised Marian S. Pierce, J. H. Bennett, Steve Brodie, Frank Durkee, Guy Wonders, William Fait, Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. Harry Reddish. C. L. Worthington came over from Philadelphia. Washington was represented by nearly every exhibitor and exchangeman and the employees of both the theaters and the exchanges.

Bronx Exhibitors Hold Ball.

Second Annual Function of Picture Theater Men Puts Big Balance on Credit Side of Club's Ledger.

THE Cinema Exhibitors' Club of the Bronx, which is Branch A of Local No. 1 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, whose headquarters are at 945 Freeman street, Bronx, New York City, held its second annual entertainment and ball at Hunt's Point Palace, One hundred and Sixty-third street and Southern Boulevard, on Saturday evening, October 31. The Cinema Exhibitors' Club is a little less than two years old, and the marked success of its first and second annual festivals signifies that progress and higher achievements are the dominant keynotes of the association and that there is harmony and unity existing among its membership. The congenial John J. Whitman, president of the club, stood at the foot of the broad stairway leading to the big ballroom. To all who knew him either intimately or casually he extended a welcome hand and a few words of greeting. The ever-present smile on his full round face and the good-natured look in his blue eyes bespoke a mind that had the interest of the merrymakers and the event at heart. Considerable credit, too, is due all other members of the club for the exactitude in which the affair was handled.

Eight o'clock was the time scheduled for the starting of the entertainment, but as the crowds were rather dilatory in appearing it was not until a few minutes after 8:30 that the first bill of the program was announced. It was an interesting and diversified show and was well received by all. There were moving pictures of comedy, dramatic and political classification, speeches of encouragement and praise of the Cinema Club by prominent men in different branches of the industry, and classic dances. A Universal picture of LKO brand entitled "A Fatal Marriage" headed the entertainment program. It was a comedy of successive laugh-creating incidents. One incident in particular which elicited a round of acclamation was where the automobile of the would-be police department in its pursuit of abductors turned several complete sommersaults. This was followed by a four-part drama under the name of "Out of the Depths" made by the Humanology Company, the scenario of which was written by Jack Rose and released by Warner's Features. It was a heart interest picture and held the attention throughout the entire four reels.

A short speech by Charles Seay, a director of the Edison Company, was the next number of the program, and he was followed by a couple of professional dances by Mary Anderson of the Vitagraph Company in what was termed the Rose Dance and the Storm Dance. Miss Anderson was dressed in pink tights covered with gauze and was as graceful in her movements as she is pretty. Prolonged handclapping was the expression of thanks accorded Miss Anderson, but owing to the number of other features for the evening she could not be induced to reappear. The next number was William Wright, general manager of the Kalem Company, who favored the assemblage with a short talk. Miss Hall, of the Thanhouser Company, and Baby Edna, of the Universal Company, gave an exhibition of classic tangoing which drew forth a round of enthusiasm. The program was brought to a close by an interesting detective drama entitled "The Phantom Cracksman," a Universal picture of the Victor persuasion, featuring Mary Fuller, a drama named "The Beast," in which Tom Moore and Alice Joyce had the leading roles, and a political picture showing county and borough officials which was the property of M. L. Fleischman, of the Garden theater, Bronx.

The hall was tastily decorated with clusters of American flags and white bunting fringed in gold, with gold stars here and there. The floor was in excellent condition for dancing. It was shortly after midnight when Henry M. Kielgast's band struck up the air for the grand march. Mary Fuller and Tom Moore led the procession, and they were followed by John J. Whitman and Mrs. Whitman. As soon as the march was over the great crowds in the boxes and those around the ballroom came forward to greet the leaders of the march, who were the cynosure of all eyes, and it was with some difficulty that they managed to get to the balcony and to their boxes. There were many other prominent photoplayers present who were receiving congratulations and felicitations of friends and associates.

Among the film companies which had boxes were the Universal, the Kalem and the World Film. A novel publicity stunt was instituted by the World Film to bring to the eyes of the public the fact that that company was there with "bells on." This company circulated throughout the hall fair-sized red and white balloons carrying their imprint and trademark. Every now and then would come reports from various parts of the place as the result of a too industrious person sticking pins into the inflated ball to see what was inside of it.

The dancing continued well into the following day, and the Cinema Club is to be congratulated upon the success of its second annual ball. A handsome souvenir program was distributed by the club. It had a large percentage of film advertisements and big half-tone cuts of Mary Fuller and Tom Moore, and also smaller cuts of different members of the various committees of the Club.

The following composed the various committees:

ARRANGEMENTS COMMITTEE.—Henry Cole, Herman Pollak, John C. L. Becker, James L. Deegan, John Wittman, Louis S. Harris.

RECEPTION COMMITTEE.—John C. L. Becker, chairman; A. B. Samuelson, H. Feltman, Geo. Suckow, C. Bolte, H. Suckow, Frank Allen, D. Cohn, Wm. Allen, I. Rothman, Frank Petters, I. Rosenfeld, H. J. James.

The Paramount's New Quarters.

Will Have a Building of Its Own on Forty-first Street—Mr. Hodkinson on the Corporation's Growth.

THE Paramount Pictures Corporation has completed arrangements which will enable it to occupy three floors of the splendid new building now in course of erection on Forty-first street, between Sixth avenue and Broadway, New York. It is proposed to call this attractive-looking structure "The Paramount Building." The corporation is now occupying the ninth and the twenty-sixth floors in the World's Tower Building, but these quarters, though both spacious and commodious, have been found entirely inadequate for the growing volume of the Paramount's business.

William W. Hodkinson, the president of the corporation, is naturally well pleased with this remarkable growth, but he is not surprised.

"It is," said he to a representative of The Moving Picture world, "the result of a strict and conscientious adherence to our quality ideas. We have perfected our system of distribution in all its details and it is now working without a flaw. We also have arranged tests of quality which, in a general way, will be based upon verdicts from exhibitors whom we will poll on an original and very effective system of our own as to the merits and quality of each production which we market. That such a system will benefit the producers who gain the best mark in quality goes without saying.

"We also have what I consider a good working system for watching the activities of our exchanges, for rating them and for holding them up to the highest averages. There is just one thing which I would like to have mentioned at this time and that is increase of our volume of advertising intended for the direct benefit of the exhibitor who uses our pictures. Our advertising along these lines is not spasmodic, but planned on a line of increase and progression. Another thing. In the struggle for obtaining the best we are competing for our patrons against the world. In other words, with us doing his selecting he is in much better position than the open market would give him."

A NEW UNIVERSAL SERIES.

The first of the new series, "Sanford Quest, Criminologist," written and produced by Otis Turner, has been completed. Herbert Rawlinson is featured in the title role. Playing opposite him, in the character of a reformed criminal, is Anna Little, with William Worthington and Laura Oakley, two of the best character people in the business making up the rest of the regular cast.

Vitagraph Theatre Program Changes.

A Good Comedy With Sidney Drew Has Novel Situations—Anita Stewart Appears to Good Advantage.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

AN UNEXPECTED change of bill at the Vitagraph theater, Broadway and 44th Street, New York, brought several interesting productions to public notice. "The Scapegoat," a comedy in which Sidney Drew is featured, was a decided novelty—bright, fresh and original. It struck out on entirely new lines, offered a bright idea, and was so well handled that it scored an unqualified success.

Drew has improved—I know that actors think they cannot improve—and he shows it in finer appreciation of what is humorous on the screen. His serious attention to the trivial had the audience laughing from the outset, and "The Scapegoat" gave him the right sort of opportunity. Discharged for incompetency from one store, he secured a lucrative position in another as a scapegoat for incompetents. Whenever anything went wrong, when a customer was dissatisfied, he was formally discharged. He was a perpetual atonement for the sins of others. If we critics could only get him to serve in a similar capacity, we might feel a greater sense of security and even be respected by all!

"The Little Angel of Canyon Creek," a five-reel story featuring Gertrude Short started out with every promise of strong interest. Beauty of scene and the remarkable personality of Gertrude—she played the part of Olaf, a little boy—caught attention and held it closely during a period not easy to cover in five-reel dramas of the screen. Round of face, phlegmatic of manner, slightly stoop-shouldered, as if stunted by heavy burdens of adverse circumstances, Olaf won sympathy from the outset. We watched the pathetic figure of the boy and became fascinated by his philosophic resignation. We were held through many scenes of simple adventure by their very simplicity, their realism, up to a point where the praying child was called upon to operate at the funeral of a desperado. From that time on the story rambled along into purely arbitrary situations, plainly following the book, until the air of excessive sanctity and universal redemption became oppressive. The child's sudden conversion to decadence and its sudden re-conversion upset a very sweet idealization and the theme as well. The effect of the child's prayers in minor situations awakened expectancy that a powerful influence would be exerted by those prayers at a crisis in the lives of principals in the drama, an expectation not realized.

"Two Women," gave the audience decided satisfaction. Here, again, personality counted. Anita Stewart never appeared to better advantage, though she persists in being a very white mountain maid. She was not only sweet to look at, but spiritual in her interpretation. The quadrangle situation has been tried out long enough to make its development an easy matter, and "Two Women" offered very little that was surprising in structure, but it was satisfying in treatment, and flawless in the matter of interpretation. The Vitagraph's magnificent company of actors and talented corps of directors, scenic artists, camera men and craftsmen in the scientific department add heavily to the general sum of values in recent products of their studio. I was sensible of a distinct advance in artistry in tinting, of tasteful exterior selections, of appropriate interiors, of greater spontaneity in acting, and, above all, of a drift from mere reflection and impersonation toward revelation of idea and purpose, the greatest secret of success.

A "Made-in-America" Movement.

United Film Service Back a Plan to Send a Producing Company Over the Country.

A NATION-WIDE motion picture enterprise, having for its object the filming of America and a campaign for a Made-in-America Day, has been inaugurated by the United Film Service (Warner's Features, Inc.). The plan involves the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars, the making of 140,000,000 feet of pictures, visiting every state and all the principal centers of each state, and the releasing of a picture a week for 40 weeks.

J. Arthur Nelson, a moving picture producer, is responsible for the idea back of this big enterprise. He is the first to urge the establishment of an annual "day" in connection with the "Made-in-America" movement, and he proposes to spread the idea broadcast by means of the "filming America" campaign.

Under the auspices of the United Film Service and the United Motion Picture Producers, Inc., Mr. Nelson will shortly start on a tour of the United States with a company of motion picture players, cameramen and scenario writers. The most prominent figure in the company will be a beautiful and accomplished young woman to bear the title of "Maid of America," who will carry the Made-in-America Day propaganda to every city and town. Chambers of Commerce, manufacturers' associations, industrial organizations and municipal governments will co-operate with the young woman in promoting the Made-in-America idea and in filming America. She will be the star player in every picture made.

London Film Man Here.

Henry Pessers Arrives in New York to Establish Branch of Bishop, Pessers & Company—Talks of British Conditions.

HENRY PESSERS, of Bishop, Pessers & Company, Ltd., London, England, is in New York City for a few days to launch an American branch of his company. Mr. Alec Lorimore, recently with the Box Office Attractions Company, is the new president of the American Bishop, Pessers & Company, Ltd. The forming of this new company means more than the mere opening of a branch of the big London firm of motion picture dealers and exchange men. The most ambitious of the company's immediate plans is to boost the distribution of Balboa and other American film brands in Europe; but it will also import pictures produced on the other side. Weekly topical pictures showing the important happenings in Europe—they call such pictures "graphics" in England—will be one of its specialties. Also, the company will at once exploit "The Making of a Scout" as a road-show in Greater New York. This is the big Boy Scout picture. It has eight reels, and President Woodrow Wilson posed in it. It is an offering of exceptional public value and has been enthusiastically endorsed by Theodore Roosevelt, Judge B. B. Lindsey and others.

Mr. Pessers, who will return home in the second week in November, is a man of much importance in the motion picture business in England. He is one of the leading exhibitors there and the owner of several fine picture houses and, since the founding of the distributing firm of Bishop, Pessers & Company, has taken a deep interest in the business in the broadest sense of that term. The company is buying all the good films it can get for the English market and is renting them directly to the theaters. There is no release date program. The offerings are rented as soon as ready. Among offerings that it has controlled, Mr. Pessers says the most profitable of recent days is "The Sign of the Cross."

Asked about the state of the English motion-picture market these days, he said that in parts of the country it was better than it had been. In the cotton-spinning and weaving districts, for instance, the bottom has fallen out of the market; but in the districts where woolen goods are made it is booming, also in cities where ammunition and small arms are manufactured it is very good.

RIFKIN WILL HANDLE ALLIANCE PROGRAMME.

It was announced by Andrew J. Cobe, General Manager of the Alliance Films Corporation, that arrangements have been completed whereby the Eastern Feature Film Company, Inc., will handle the Alliance Programme in the New England territory.

Herman Rifkin, President and General Manager of the Eastern Feature Film Co., Inc., with offices at 57-59 Church Street, Boston, Mass., is well known to the exhibitors in New England and the news of his having secured the Alliance Programme for that territory will be greatly welcomed by them. They will have the following big features to start with: "The Hoosier Schoolmaster," featuring Max Figman, "The Key to Yesterday," "The Path Forbidden," "At the Old Cross Roads," and "McVeagh of the South Seas." Exhibitors of that territory should get in touch with Mr. Rifkin of the Eastern Feature Film Co., Inc., for the Alliance Programme for their theatre.

CHICAGO PASSES "THE ORDEAL."

Jesse J. Goldburg, secretary of the Life Photo Film Corporation, returned from Chicago with the last five-part feature release of the company, where the production was reviewed by the Board of Censors there. "The Ordeal" was passed without a single cut or elimination which is considered quite an endorsement of the picture, in view of the known severity of the attitude taken by the Chicago Board on motion picture productions.

While in the middle west, Mr. Goldburg disposed of the rights to "The Ordeal" for Illinois, Iowa, Indiana and Nebraska to the Peerless Film Exchange, of that city, and for Michigan and Ohio on "The Ordeal" as well as "Capt. Swift," "Northern Lights" and "The Greyhound," prior releases of the Life Photo Film Corporation, to the Famous Stars Film Alliance of Cleveland, Ohio.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

By G. P. von Harleman.

CHICAGO has not a big first-class moving picture theater in the "loop." The loop is commercially to Chicago what the business section of Manhattan is to New York. It is the comparatively small space of the downtown district encircled by all the elevated roads of the city. Practically all the office buildings and big retail stores are located here. The loop is the pulsating heart of Chicago, and more people are found on State street, inside the loop, any time of the day, than on any street, part or all of it, in New York City.

Notwithstanding this, State street can only boast of one first-class moving picture theater, the Orpheum, a house belonging to Jones, Linick & Schaeffer, and seating about 800. The Orpheum at that, is only a very ordinary moving picture thater and cannot compare with some of the rather elaborate houses we have in our suburbs or in the surrounding towns. We have here in Chicago absolutely nothing that can compare with the magnificent photoplay palaces of New York and Philadelphia.

Chicago has, however, a considerable number of very attractive and well conducted "family theaters" in the residence district, especially on the south side. Outside of the Orpheum there are altogether eleven moving picture theaters in the loop. They are the Pastime, Star, Casino, Rose and Alcazar, in a bunch on Madison street; the Cozy and the Boston, on Clark street; the Theatorium, Bijou Dream, Premier and Lyric, on State street. All these houses are less than 500 in seating capacity and, outside of a very few, catering to the cheapest kind of patronage, advertising their so-called features with glaring sensational posters plastered all over the place. This refers particularly to the State street houses, which, in addition to their posters, have very prominent signs informing the public that positively no children under 21 years are admitted.

The theaters on Madison street are of a better class, and I must say, generally give a very fair show, but these houses are not in any way superior to the moving picture theaters one finds in any city of 10,000 inhabitants or more.

Now, it seems to the outsider that we people here in Chicago are missing our opportunities and that there ought to be wonderful possibilities for a "real" moving picture theater—a big, magnificent picture palace like the "Strand" in New York. Perhaps there are, but conditions here in Chicago, I dare say, are quite different from what they are in most large cities. In the first place, the only location for a large moving picture theater is in the loop. To get a suitable location on one of the main arteries is nearly impossible, and the price would be quite prohibitive. In the second place, and which is a great drawback, is the remarkable fact that the loop is almost deserted after ten o'clock at night. The side streets are dark as pitch, with hardly a soul strolling around. Some street corners are always quite lively, but certainly nothing like New York, where you see more people on Broadway at night than in daytime.

Chicago is a home town and the people, whether wealthy or poor, do not patronize amusement places at night to the extent they do in other big cities. They may take in the family theaters in their residence neighborhood, and these moving picture theaters are doing mighty well, but nobody wants to go downtown to see a picture show. That is the reason we have no big picture palace in the loop. The day business alone would not pay their tremendous operating expenses.

In conjunction with this might be mentioned that negotiations have been under way this week to open two picture theaters on Randolph street, between Dearborn and Clark. One of these theater projects was to reconstruct the entire lower floor of the old Union Hotel and Restaurant into a large moving picture theater, having a seating capacity of 1,200 or more. However, I understand that this proposition fell through on account of the requirements of the building department. To meet these requirements construction work would have to be done involving three entire floors of the building. This would have cost more money than those interested were willing to spend. However, even if the expense should have been considerable, I believe it would have been a good investment, as the location is one of the very best for a picture house in Chicago.

Another theater enterprise is being considered across the street, at 61 W. Randolph street, but nothing definite so far is known.

Decorators Supply Co.'s Big Plant Devastated by Fire.

The Decorators Supply Co. of Chicago, the well-known builders and decorators of moving picture theaters, lost the greater part of their plant by fire, Saturday, October 31st.

How the fire started is not known. Bales of excelsior piled in a room adjoining the engine-room in some way caught fire and from there the flames rapidly spread all over the place. Two hundred employees were in the building at the time of the fire, and many of them owe their life and safety to Miss Nellie Deutsch, the telephone operator. In spite of the flames and overpowering smoke, Miss Deutsch refused to leave her switch-board until she had warned the various departments of the fire. All attempts to extinguish the fire failed, and by the time Battalion Chief John Hackett and his men arrived an entire section was blazing. Burning brands, scattered by the wind following the falling-in of roofs and floors, dropped on to a number of frame cottages to the east of the structure, setting fire to them and driving their occupants to the street.

Chief Hackett turned in a 4-11 alarm. Soon afterward Fire Marshal "Tom" O'Connor sent in a number of special calls. Yet, with all the equipment the fire-fighters had at their command it was all they could do to keep the blaze under control and to extinguish the smaller fires nearby.

They managed to confine the fire to two of the three sections of the building. The interior of the south section was destroyed, only the walls being left standing. The middle section was partly wrecked.

The loss is estimated at $100,000, but is covered fully by insurance. Mr. Foster, the general manager of the concern, told the Western Representative of the Moving Picture World that, though handicapped for a few weeks, they still would be able to take care of their theater business.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Maurice Fleckles, general manager of the Laemmle Film Service, returned to Chicago Saturday, October 31st, after an eleven weeks' stay in Europe.

A. F. Gammond, traveling representative for the new "Columbus" brand of the General Film Co.'s output, was in the city for a few days. Mr. Gammond has made an extended tour over the country, and reports business conditions very encouraging, especially out West. The trend of the time though, Mr. Gammond says, is for shorter features. The people are getting tired of long serials.

BOB DALY'S BIG NIGHT.

Screeners in Annual Meeting Assembled Give Remarkable Reception to Director Starting for Pacific Coast.

AT the annual meeting of the Screen Club, held on the evening of Friday, October 30, William Robert ("Bob") Daly was called on for a speech. Mr. Daly was retiring from the board of governors after two years of most efficient service. The club and all its interests have been very close to him; he was with the organization at the beginning, his name is conspicuous on the engrossed charter, his zeal has never flagged. At the end of an impassioned talk Mr. Daly broke the news that he had known since 8 o'clock that evening that the following afternoon he was to start for the Pacific Coast. He bade a collective good-bye to all his pals and sat down. The members of the club stood up and gave the popular "Bob" a send-off he will remember. There was hand-clapping and there were cheers for the retiring member of the governing board. Later a message was drafted to the Photoplayers of Los Angeles and signed by all present, commending to the officers and members of the Western players the departing Screener.

William Robert ("Bob") Daly.

The occasion was the stated annual gathering of the Screen Club. There were reports of officers to be listened to, as well as speeches from the retiring officers. Then the incoming officers were installed and there were messages from them. Everyone was in an optimistic mood. After listening to the reports, which showed strength in numbers and in finances, there was reason for the gay spirit prevailing. King Baggot, retiring from his two years' presidency, congratulated the members on the remarkable showing made by the young organization. President James Kirkwood said that his policy would be to extend the scope and influence of the Screen Club, and that in furtherance of this he would give particular attention to the entertainment side of the organization's affairs. At the conclusion of the meeting there was a jollification in the grill-room, enlivened by singing by the Vitagraph Quartet, which very shortly was multiplied in numbers several times.

Just now the members of the club are giving all their attention to the coming annual ball, which is to be held in the grand ball-room of the Hotel Astor on Thanksgiving eve, November 25. The tickets are $5 each, admitting two, and are on sale at the clubhouse at 165 West Forty-seventh street, and by the members. Jule Bernstein, who is in charge of the sale of boxes, reports that he is receiving a gratifying number of applications for space. As before announced, there will be no advertising solicited or accepted in connection with this year's event. The club aims to make the ball not the biggest but the best and most pleasurable social function that has taken place within the confines of the motion picture industry. That's shooting at a high mark, but the Screeners expect to hit it.

KINETOPHOTE EXCHANGES.

Contracts for Distribution Cover All Territory—Many Strong Alliances Formed.

THE K. C. Booking Co., Incorporated, has closed contracts with enough big independent exchanges to cover the entire country with its exclusive programme, which now includes the releases of the Kinetophote Corporation and other features which have been obtained from independent producers.

In New England the K. C. will book through the American Feature Film Co., of 162 Tremont Street, Boston, a concern which has been handling nothing but the best and biggest of features in all of the New England states.

The Eastern Booking Offices with branches in Pittsburg and Cleveland will take the K. C. offerings in every instance. The Eastern head office at 1237 Vine Street, Philadelphia, will book for Eastern Pennsylvania, Southern New Jersey, Virginia, Delaware and the District of Columbia. The Pittsburg branch of the Eastern Company in 432 Wabash Building, and will take care of Western Pennsylvania and West Virginia. The Eastern Company's Cleveland branch is in No. 218, the Columbia Building, and will handle the K. C. films for the entire State of Ohio.

The K. C. is opening a branch office in Chicago to see that the product is properly handled in Illinois and Wisconsin.

The Progressive Film and Equipment Company will take care of Indiana and Kentucky from offices in Indianapolis.

In the South the Atlantic Film Service of Atlanta, Ga., will look after the K. C. interests in Georgia, Alabama, North Carolina, South Carolina and Florida. The offices are to be situated in Atlanta, Georgia.

The far West and Coast territory will be covered by the service of the California Film Service Corporation with offices in San Francisco. This company will distribute in California, Oregon, Washington, New Mexico, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, Nevada, Arizona and Utah. The California Corporation has opened branches in Salt Lake City, Denver, Seattle, Portland, Ore., and Los Angeles.

As announced last week, the K. C. has signed contracts with the Dallas Film Company of Dallas, Texas, to take over the booking of features for Texas, Louisiana, Oklahoma and Arkansas.

For New York State and Northern New Jersey, the K. C. headquarters at 126 West 46th Street will be the distributing center.

WESTERN TRADE CONDITIONS GOOD.

Arthur M. Rosenbach of the Excelsior Feature Film Company has just returned to New York from a trip through the west. Regarding trade in that section Mr. Rosenbach said:

I have seldom had a more satisfactory trip in every way than the one which I have just completed. The farming districts through which I passed were all prepared for bumper crops, and the manufacturing sections were all busy to capacity. When a man has had a satisfactory trip, such as I have had, he is naturally optimistic, but I do not believe that my hopeful views are merely a reflection of the success of the Excelsior Feature Film Company. I am confident, as the result of my observations, that the market for high-grade pictures, such as "The Path Forbidden" and "When Fate Leads Trump" is daily growing stronger, more dependable, and in every way more satisfactory.

SCATES GOES TO WORLD FILM.

General Manager Lewis J. Selznick of the World Film Corporation announces the appointment of W. R. Scates as division manager of the World Film Corporation with headquarters in Chicago. Mr. Scates' territory gives him supervision over the following branch offices: Cleveland, Cincinnati, Detroit, Indianapolis, Chicago, Minneapolis, Omaha, Kansas City and St. Louis. Mr. Scates is a very well-known film exchange manager, having been associated with the Eclectic Film Company and the General Film Company. Mr. Scates is accompanying General Manager Selznick and Sales Manager C. R. Seelye on a tour of inspection of all the offices under his supervision. The officials plan to complete their tour within ten days.

Doings at Los Angeles

WESTERN UNION Night Letter, Oct. 23. 1914.

W. H. Clune, Los Angeles.
Three bales fine Imperial Valley cotton shipped you by express today per your order. This is real assistance. The Imperial Valley Chamber of Commerce desires to express to you its deep appreciation for your patriotic action.
W. H. COMPTON, Managing Director.

THE above wire nearly explains the action of Mr. Clune, who wired the Imperial people to send the cotton which he placed in the lobbies of his three big theaters, labeling each "We bought a bale, have you?" Each patron was given a sample of the cotton, and the "Buy a Bale" project was boosted to the skies. Mr. Clune says that California cotton has not had the publicity and the industry is not recognized on account of the big campaign in the south. The boost was a good one, as evinced by the telegram.

The "Trey o' Hearts" company returned from the canyon this week and the last picture of the big series is completed and the players are off on a good vacation. George Larkin has gone on a trip south to San Diego, Coronado and the intermediate towns and resorts. Some will remain at home, while others will travel far and wide for their leisure days. As the result of the success of this series, Larkin is to be featured in a new company under the direction of Frank Lloyd, who was with Otis Turner. He directed while Mr. Turner was on his vacation, and so good was he that Manager Bernstein decided to organize a new company. Helen Leslie will be the ingenue, playing leads. Mark Robbins will be the character man and Lloyd will play the heavies and characters. Rex brand will be their release.

Hallowe'en never passed here but what something big was on foot for the Photoplayers' Club, and this season a big all star program of vaudeville was given the fans at the Mason Opera House for two nights.

When Jesse L. Lasky arrived here this week his jaw dropped in genuine surprise, for what he saw was not what he gazed on when he left a few months ago. The genial head of the feature picture firm is exploring the studio with its string of 16 new dressing rooms, making 50 in all; a big new riot extra room with capacity for 50 male and 50 female people; a new and complete wardrobe building, with a manager; scene storeroom; a big complete machine shop, and various other buildings and additions, besides a double laboratory. November 2 a new company will be added, the director of which has not yet been named. A director from the east is coming out to start still another company soon. The offices are being improved and altered.

Bob Leonard and the rest of his players have come from San Francisco after doing some water stuff for "The Master Key." H. John Fleming Wilson, author of the story, went with the players to the northern city to put in some atmosphere, having sailed the seas for some time himself and being familiar with the life of the wave.

Some people say others have cast iron stomachs, but here is an instance of a man having a cast iron foot, for Ralph Lewis, playing the lead in "His Responsibility," a Mutual picture, was run over by a heavily laden auto truck, and not an injury resulted, although a bad bruise pained him for some time. He slipped while trying to jump aboard the moving vehicle.

Douglas Gerrard has a friend in London. He wanted some British pipes and a few walking sticks, so he wrote his friend, who was coming across the water, to load up with the articles, and if he had a chance to bring any other things dear to the heart of a man. The friend wrote that he had started with a bag of socks, collars, ties and various furnishings, and said that the pipes and sticks he did not have time to get. What Jerry said is fit to print, but we could not keep up with his line of talk, it was so fast.

Reeve story in Cosmopolitan, only with an added talent, that of hypnotism, is shown thrillingly in Otis Turner's two-reel feature with Herbert Rawlinson and Anna Little, "Sanford Quest, Criminologist." Rawley is great in the part of the hypnotic detective. He uses all scientific methods and saves the girl from a band of crooks. The picture is one of the best ever done on this order.

That this little world is pretty small was proved the other day when William H. Reid, the genial manager of the Photoplayers Club, told me that he was going to live at the beach. It's all right if you can swim, I told him, and he said he ought to be able to as he had been at sea 15 years and had crossed the Pacific only 82 times. "Then you have been in Hong Kong?" He replied that he had, and then we had half an hour's talk about the Orient, finding that we both had been there at the same time a few years ago.

"Zudora"

"The Spotted Collar," Released November 23, Is the First Number of Thanhouser's Big Serial.

THE first issue of Thanhouser's big serial "Zudora" was shown at the factory in New Rochelle last week. "The Mystic Message of the Spotted Collar" is the title of the initial number. Beginning November 23 the subjects will be released weekly for twenty weeks. Each picture will consist of two parts. The story is from the pen of Harold MacGrath. Daniel Carson Goodman has translated Mr. MacGrath's work for the screen. Before viewing the first number of the serial in the new projection room of the Thanhouser factory the World man was escorted about the big motion picture plant by Jay Cairns, chief of the publicity department. Also along as fellow-guests of the hospitable exploiter of Thanhouser quality were Arthur James and Merritt Crawford, the Reel Life fellows who keep the world at large well posted on the doings of the Mutual Film Corporation.

Dr. Goodman took the party into the older studio, where are the elaborate settings for the home of Hassam Ali, the mystic detective who figures so prominently in the "Zudora" series. The visitors passed through secret doors—that is, all with the exception of Crawford; they viewed the teakwood furniture which adorns the apartment as well as the draperies; admired the Oriental god which Dr. Goodman had procured in Chinatown and the great mystic globe, and with unanimity expressed the opinion that Dr. Goodman has most successfully established his atmosphere. Later there was an interesting half hour watching Director Durkin as he patiently and gently guided little Helen Badgley through the intricate path of a dissolve. Sidney Bracey in a box-like structure was posing for an introductory bit in which from one character he was to be dissolved into another costume.

It was Helen's duty to open the door, talk to the butler, stand rigid, and after the change of garb by Mr. Bracy to greet him. It was all revelatory of the infinite time and patience required to photograph a scene which on the screen is but a flash:

"The Mystic Message of the Spotted Collar."

The principals in the cast of "Zudora" are Marguerite Snow, James Cruze and Harry Benham. Miss Snow is Zudora, a girl of eighteen in love with John Storm, portrayed by Mr. Benham. Mr. Cruze is Hassam Ali, the guardian of Zudora. Hassam Ali conceals from the girl the fact that according to the will of her father she is at her eighteenth birthday to come into possession of the fabulously wealthy Zudora mine. He refuses to permit her to marry Storm. He does, however, so far relent as to concede that if Zudora shall successfully resolve his next twenty detective cases she may marry the man of her choice.

"Zudora" makes a most auspicious beginning. Mr. Cruze is most convincing as the mystic who is as skillful in the uncovering of other's crimes as he is in concealing his own. Miss Snow in this number has a strong part, one requiring fine judgment and artistry that the melodramatic may be avoided. She most acceptably fulfills the demands of her role. Mr. Beham as the lawyer lover falsely accused and nearly convicted of causing the death of his professional opponent is strong and likable. The supporting cast is large and competent.

Dr. Goodman has made free use of "back construction." So, too, has he in his big situations maintained suspense by means of cut-backs and ingenious double exposures. We have referred to the interior of Hassam Ali's home. His courtroom scene is likewise notable. We are told that it is an actual setting, easily procured by the Thanhouser company in New Rochelle, as it seems the townspeople have given to the company chiefs the key of the city. If the succeeding numbers of "Zudora" match the initial release, and the intimation is strong that they will be even better, the serial should be highly popular.

Howard Estabrook

ACCOMPANYING is a splendid likeness of Howard Estabrook, latest of the Broadway stars to join the ranks of the photoplayers. Mr. Estabrook plays the lead of Travers Gladwin in George Kleine's film version of the famous Cohen & Harris success, "Officer 666."

Mr. Estabrook has appeared under the management of William A. Brady, David Belasco and others. He counts among his greatest successes the male "leads" in "Within the Law," "Divorcons" and "The Vanishing Bride." Mr. Estabrook has been prominently identified with many other famous Broadway productions, including William Collier in "The Dictator," Blanche Walsh in "The Straight Road," Arnold Daly in "The Boys of Company B," Joe Weber in "Hip Hip Hurrah," Holbrook Blinn in "The Boss," Grace George in "Jim's Marriage" and Cyril Scott in "The "Fatted Calf."

Howard Estabrook.

Mr. Estabrook's youth and his vast stage experience, coupled with his very apparent good looks, make his success in the new line of work a foregone conclusion.

CHANGE IN LASKY RELEASE DATES.

Instead of releasing the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company's production of "The Rose of The Rancho" on November 16, the Paramount Picture Corporation will offer this, the first of the Lasky-Belasco productions, Monday, November 30. This change was made necessary owing to a slight delay at the studio, caused by Director General De Mille's desires to stage the final scenes on the Mexican border. Other than this change, the Lasky releases through the Paramount Corporation, will be as announced in the recent advertisements of the Paramount Corporation.

"Helen's Sacrifice"

Helen Holmes Is Herione of New Series of Railroad Melodramas Being Released by Kalem.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE demand for well-made, really thrilling melodramas shows no signs of fagging and the Kalem Company, with an eye to the fact that series, rather than serial, pictures are popular—the Alice Joyce series has proved this—has begun to release a number of railroad melodramas with Helen Holmes as heroine. They are to be one-reel offerings; each to be in itself a complete story, yet connected with the whole set by the characters and by their surroundings—they are all to tell stories of railroaders. Adventures, thrills to raise your hair, we are told, are to be plentiful, but there is to be very little crime pictured in the series. We can vouch for the fact that there is one nerve-tingler of a thrill in this first of of them, "Helen's Sacrifice." The pretty heroine goes down a steep, sandy bank, horse and all. We didn't expect her to come up, but she managed to swim the horse across all right.

Helen Holmes.

The Kalem people have long liked to make railroad pictures and have made some of the very best of them. They seem to have exceptional facilities for giving realistic touches to such stories, and their work, so we are told, has been especially popular in railroad towns where the spectators knows what this kind of picture ought to be like. One other advantage they have had, and this is exploited in this new series—the technical knowledge of railroading and the sympathetic acquaintance with railroaders of E. W. Witlock, train despatcher and railroad expert, who has written the scripts for the series. Frank Howard Clark, who understands the requirements of screen portrayals, has helped in getting the stories into the best form.

The heroine, Helen, is a railroader, a telegraph operator in a depot out in the country, one of those places with a switch where a freight can be held up to let a passenger pass. This character is played through the whole series by Helen Holmes, whose nerve and splendid physical gifts reinforcing her abilities as an actress make her the very ideal as heroine of such stories. If this first offering gives a true taste of what is to come, she will need all her fortitude before she is through.

The big scenes in this story come in her dash on horseback to intercept a freight train and avert a terrible accident. The short cut is, of course, not along the highway, but over rough country, and the route is not without its obstacles. At one place the only bridge available is down—the workmen are repairing it, but it is still no thoroughfare and she can't possibly cross. The river flows in a deep gully and she must cross it. The banks are sandy and almost perpendicular and the girl's horse is most reluctant to take the step off the firm ground, but she is determined and down they go, seemingly all mixed up, into the water. Then there's a swim across and another gallop to the way station at which she can meet, if fate wills, the freight and warn its crew of the passenger—cut-back scenes have shown this to us coming along fast in the opposition direction and on the same track. She does reach there in time; but with not a moment to spare, for the passenger is on time. This incident though acceptably done is not so snappy as some other scenes we can remember in other Kalems that have used a like climax.

Scene from "Helen's Sacrifice" (Kalem).

The fact that the train got past the first station was due not to any fault of Helen, but to the man operator. His baby was sick and he had to sit up all night tending it. His nerves were tired and he let another piece of business that came up distract his attention. Helen knowing all this takes the blame to save this man, her friend, from being fired, he being a man of family and needing the job. That is "Helen's Sacrifice."

The director responsible for the picture is J. P. McGovern, who plays the part of the man operator. Ethel Clisbee plays as his wife. The picture as a whole makes a very fair offering. It is not perfectly even in dramatic suspense, but at its best is very thrilling. It is surely well acted and the camera work is fine. It will be liked.

Mayre Hall

MISS MAYRE HALL, who was formerly with the Imp Company and now leading lady for the Thanhauser in the Princess Company, was born on a farm in the State of Ohio. Her parents moved to Cincinnati when she was a very small child. At the age of eight years, with her mother she was playing in stock and remained with stock companies until she was 15 years old, when she branched out on the vaudeville stage and made a grand success. Working alone, the greatest hit she made while in vaudeville was doing Italian impersonating and as she was gifted with a very sweet voice, she was the headliner at many theaters on the circuit of which she played.

Mayre Hall.

We might say that Miss Hall has been constantly on the stage from the time she was 8 years old and until April, 1913, when she came to New York to fill an engagement with the Imp Company. Miss Hall is 19 years old, very pretty, animating, quick to anticipate her Directors and has filled her parts with such rare ability that it is believed that it is only a matter of time that she will become one of the popular stars in moving pictures. Miss Hall at the present time lives in New Rochelle near the Thanhouser Studio.

NORWICH GETS BIG PICTURE HOUSE.

The Tennis Amusement Company, whose home office is in Utica, N. Y., and which is operating and controlling picture theaters in that city and Poughkeepsie, N. Y., will open about December 1 the Colonia, a big moving picture theater, at Norwich, N. Y. The new house will have a seating capacity of 1,300, and it will be one of the finest theaters between Albany and Buffalo. No expense is being spared to permit of the inclusion of all conveniences that will go to make patrons comfortable and the house beautiful. A. E. Ford, who is now proprietor and manager of the Best theater in Norwich, will be retained as resident manager. The Tennis Company is composed of Adam Tennis, president; Peter Karl, vice-president, and Peter Tennis, secretary and treasurer.

"Tillie's Punctured Romance"

Marie Dressler, in Sennett's Six-Reel Keystone, Will Contribute Much to the Gayety of Nations.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

WHEN Mack Sennett was in the East a couple of months ago he confided to a friend that in the making of his six-reel comedy in which Marie Dressler was starred he had given all that he had. After viewing "Tillie's Punctured Romance" we are bound to say he had a lot to give. At the time the Keystone producer was here he was in doubt as to what the title of the comedy would be. When he intimated to a party of film men that he was thinking of "She Was More Sinned Against Than Necessary," there was hearty acclaim. The advisability of incorporating "Tillie" in the title, that the star of the piece by reason of previous associations might be more clearly identified, turned the scale.

Scene from "Tillie's Punctured Romance" (Keystone).

Marie Dressler breaks into the story at the first jump. She is in the scene every minute right to the finish. She fits into the Keystone style of work as to the manner born. She kicks and is kicked, she falls and gets up or is laboriously picked up; sober or unsober she is inimitable. Trouble follows in her ample wake; if at any moment there seems an insufficiency of disturbance she beats a strategic retreat and takes a fresh strangle hold on everything and everybody and starts something new. That she survives her strenuous experience is remarkable; it is a tribute to her vitality as well as her agility. In fact, it is inexplicable that these boneless but never spineless Keystone players live to play another day.

Charles Chaplin plays opposite Miss Dressler. In apposition with the famous woman of the legitimate comedy stage, the screen player suffers not a whit by comparison. The two constitute a rare team of funmakers—the sort of combination that not only tempts but impels an ordinary fallible reviewer to indulge in extravagant language. Chaplin outdoes Chaplin; that's all there is to it. His marvelous right-footed skid—and it seems to make no difference whether he have under him rough highway or parlor floor—is just as funny in the last reel as it is in the first. Chaplin's serious face is seldom crossed by a smile. With perfect confidence he leaves laughter to others; and well he may.

Mabel Normand is the third principal in the large cast. She has the role of the unsuccessful rival for Charlie's hand; that is, she is unsuccessful for a short but exceedingly lively period ending in the harried and bedraggled Tillie resigning her claim to the fickle bridegroom. Miss Normand sustains in her own mirthful way the quieter role—always speaking comparatively, of course—that falls to her. Charles Bennett is the millionaire uncle who is not killed by the fall down the snow-covered mountainside and whose return to the scene of Tillie's rampage is the climax as it is also the dramatic catastrophe of his sole heiress' flight in high society. We also recognized Mr. Bennett in two minor characters.

The picture is finely staged. The interiors of the mansion wherein Tillie and her husband entertain society are elaborate and luxurious. The bit in the snow above the clouds makes an impressive contrast with the sunshine-flooded vegetation of the lower country. The photography throughout is of a high order.

There is no use talking about situations. In "Tillie's Punctured Romance" there are nothing but situations. There's a story, of course, and it is sufficient. It shows how Tillie is wooed by Charlie and is given the mitten in favor of Mabel. When Charlie reads that through the death of the uncle Tillie is heir to three millions, he encompasses a hasty marriage before Tillie gets the news. Of course, it afterward develops uncle is not dead, but very, very much alive. Tillie, however, is pretty near dead by the time she has removed from her expansive chest several matters that weigh heavily upon it. Before the battle is over the Keystone "cops" have the riot of their tempestuous, catlike lives, an automobile takes a plunge into the Pacific—the only calm element in the show—and Tillie, after several tedious lifts and sudden immersions is finally landed on the pier. Mabel falls in the arms of Tillie. Charlie is "jugged."

Mack Sennett has done well.

BOX OFFICE HAS A WINSOR M'CAY NOVELTY.

The Box Office Attractions Company has arranged with Winsor McCay to market his one-reel comedy, "Gertie," the Dinosaurus. The subject has been in constant demand by vaudeville managers. The film got $350 for one week at the Palace Theater, New York, the best house on the United Circuit. It is the biggest figure ever paid for a single reel attraction. Through the Box Office Attraction Company, exhibitors will get an opportunity to book this feature single reel comedy at reasonable rates.

Winsor McCay, creator of "Little Nemo," "Dreams of a Rarebit Fiend" and other popular newspaper cartoons of international fame, has set a new pace with his hand-drawn film of a trained "Dinosaurus" which he prosaically calls "Gertie." This film achievement is a new departure in the industry as well as in art. "Dinosaurus" is a huge carnivorous monster that ruled this planet in pre-historic times.

FAMOUS PLAYERS TO PRODUCE "THE LOVE ROUTE."

The Famous Players Film Company will shortly begin the production of "The Love Route," the famous comedy-drama of love and railroads, by Edward Peple, author of "The Spitfire" and the recent success "A Pair of Sixes." The film version of this noted modern romance will be produced in the West with Marguerite Clark, the dainty star of "Wildflower," who left last week for Los Angeles, to appear in a forthcoming production for the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Photoplay Co., to which company the Famous Players loaned the services of their star, for a limited time. Allan Dwan, of the producing staff of the Famous Players, will leave this week for the coast, where he will join Marguerite Clark and begin work on the production.

BLACKWELL MAKING "THE LAST CHAPTER."

With "The Man Who Could Not Lose" shipped East, Carlyle Blackwell, of the Favorite Players, is starting on a five-reel production, another of Richard Harding Davis' stories, entitled "The Last Chapter." The story as originally written is called "An Unfinished Story," but this title has been changed to more suitably fit the photoplay, and the new name is an apt one.

Among the Picture Theaters

TEMPLE THEATER AT SOO REMODELED.

Cook & Beardsley's $10,000 Picture Theater a Beautiful Structure—Has Seating Accommodations for Over 800.

ONE of the finest picture theaters in the Northwest is the New Temple Theater, which was opened Monday evening, August 24, by Cook & Beardsley at Soo, Mich. The ideas incorporated in the erection of the new structure were obtained by the owners after many months of travel in different cities, studying the number of picture theaters and carefully digesting all printed information on the subject. That their time and energy were not expended in vain is manifested in the illustrations of the Temple Theater accompanying this article.

There is a gradual but sufficient incline to the floor of the main auditorium which gives an uninterrupted perspective of the screen from any seat on that floor. Two broad stairways lead to the balcony where the fireproof operating room is situated. Twenty-two-inch ventilators, which extend for four feet above the roof, carry off the heat from the projection machines, and a big suction fan removes the impurities from the room. As one ascends the balcony stairs he approaches two boxes each containing six chairs. These boxes are beautifully furnished with plush carpets and draperies. Of the two hundred seats in the balcony the first three rows are for reserve. The entire auditorium contains over 600 seats of which 136 are in the loges and will also be held for reserve. The interior wood decorations are of birch and dark mahogany and the paintings are done in oil, while the other inside embellishments are of ivory and gold. The chairs are of a special design, two inches larger than the ordinary and one and a half inches in excess of the regulation distance is left between each row of seats.

All the wiring has been done in conduits, which is in accordance with the law. The indirect lighting system is employed. There are six sixteen-inch suction fans in the ceiling which has capacity enough to change 9,270 cubic feet of air per minute. In front of the stage is the orchestra pit. On both sides of the proscenium arch are elaborate booths designed for singers and are draped in heavy plush curtains.

The flooring of the lobby is of terraza marble. The dimensions of the lobby are 10 feet by 40 feet, and the six doors leading into the auditorium are of brown opalescent glass. There is a canopy over the sidewalk in front of the structure which covers a space 12 feet wide by 41 feet long. The canopy is made of steel and iron and is decorated with mottled green opalescent glass. The name of the theater has been worked in the drop at both ends of the canopy and the words "Temple Theater" have been carefully inserted in the front drop of the covering. So big and heavy is this marquise that it is supported by three iron columns which carry a number of large electric globes, giving the front a brilliant illumination at night.

The Temple theater is not an entirely new structure; it is a remodeled building, and the policy will remain the same as the one employed in the old house—that is, first-class moving pictures. There is a matinee each afternoon, and three shows each evening. The employees of the old house will be given employment in the new structure. On the opening day, according to the managers, there were 2,200 who purchased tickets for the show, and many hundreds were turned away. The new Temple represents an expenditure of $10,000.

FICHTENBERG'S THEATER IN PENSACOLA.

THE chain of palatial photoplay theaters that the Fichtenberg Amusement Enterprises are building throughout the South has received a notable addition in the Isis Theater recently opened in Pensacola, Fla. This house is probably the most elegantly appointed in the state of Florida. It is an artistic combination of bronze, marble, mosaic and art glass, and its equipment embodies the latest ideas in comfort, sanitation and perfect projection. The Isis is situated on Palafox street, in the heart of the business section, and has a seating capacity of 700.

In addition to the Isis in Pensacola, the Fichtenberg Amusement Enterprises, of which Herman Fichtenberg is the directing genius, controls the Isis Theater in Houston, and the Isis, Plaza and Alamo Theaters in New Orleans, beside several other houses in other points in Louisiana and Texas. One of the many features of the new theater is the big organ which can be seen on each side of the proscenium arch by looking closely at the accompanying illustration. This is an artistic arrangement and, with the aid of the perfect acoustic properties of the Isis, the music dispensed by this $5,000 instrument splendidly "fills" the house.

B. A. Mulligan is the manager. The Isis has a seating capacity of 1,000, and cost in the neighborhood of $85,000 to build. In the operating room, which is in the back of the first balcony, there are two motor-driven Simplex machines among the up-to-date equipment. The house was opened May 14, and has been playing to satisfactory business since that date.

ROYAL THEATER, KANSAS CITY, MO.

THE Royal theater is located on Main street, between Tenth and Eleventh, Kansas City, Mo. The merchants in this section of the city, which is a shopping district, looked on moving pictures with contempt and hatred. This attitude was crystallized in the passing of a local ordinance prohibiting moving picture houses from locating within a certain district, of whch Main street is a part. This measure was passed after Frank L. Newman, presdent and manager of the Royal Picture Theater Company, owners of the new house, had begun work with a view to giving Kansas City its handsomest structure for the exploitation of the moving picture. Some exhibitors might have been discouraged. Mr. Newman engaged legal talent who shortly began filling the ordinance in question full of large holes. Work on the house went steadily forward. The theater was opened in June and the retailers who had opposed the building of the theater had their eyes opened. They were beaten legally, but the gratifying feature is that after the Royal opened they were glad they had been whipped. The Royal, as any exhibitor could have told them, attracted high class custom to itself, and to the stores nearby.

The Royal's style of architecture is one that might be characterized as the modern French type, both in exterior and interior. The front is of terra cotta. A touch of softened dignity was lent the front by eight art glass windows, given the French Renaissance treatment. These windows are attractive during the day, but assume their most pleasing aspect after nightfall, when they are lighted from the back. Lavish but effective use of electricity has been made in the exterior of the Royal as well as interior. The building is outlined in electric lights, 640 lamps being used. Three flambeaux, so constructed as to appear to be flaming, also are features of the exterior lighting facilities. Three hundred lights are used in the flambeaux, making a total of about 1,000 on the outside of the theater and giving Mr. Newman something to ponder over in the proportions of his monthly lighting bill.

There are no steps in or about the Royal—at least on the ground floor. Everything is reached by soft inclines. In case of necessity for emptying the house quickly, there would be no chance for injury by falling down a flight of steps. The danger of fire is a remote one indeed, however. The Royal is a solid steel structure, as nearly fireproof as engineers have been able to conceive up to the present. Three thousand five hundred persons are daily patronizing the house. The American Seating Company furnished the seats for the Royal. The musicians' pit is arranged as in most legitimate houses. Four musicians are used in the morning and nine during the afternoon and night. The console of the $7,500 organ also is in the pit, though the instrument itself is placed over the rear exit.

The stage is large enough for any little or big diversions desired by the management, being 14 by 21 feet. The proscenium arch is 19 by 21 feet. The mirror screen is 13 feet 9 inches by 17 feet 6 inches. Three Powers machines are used, and two spotlights are available. Those who dearly love the coquettish touches of the legitimate find them at the Royal. The exhibitions begin at a specified time, given on the program and billboards, and not whenever the operators feel like starting. The bright lights are subdued, and soft green ones switched on. The draperies swing backward and upward, revealing the curtain, and the operator, with this formality dispensed with, begins his share of the work.

Many features designed to appeal to the public have been embodied in the Royal. For instance, there is a nursery in the basement, over which a trained nurse presides. Four cribs have been installed and parenthood no longer means close confinement to the home. For the kiddies too big for cribs, and not big enough to understand or enjoy the productions there is a playroom provided with all of the most modern toys and devices with which to while away the hours.

There also are ample accommodations for the adults. Rest rooms for men and women are on hand, equipped with wicker lounges, easy chairs, telephone booths, ice water fountains, tile toilet rooms and other adjuncts. That section of the basement lying under the stage is given over to locker rooms for the musicians and dressing rooms for any talent which may be employed. Upstairs, Mr. Newman has reserved his own office, with a window which allows a view of the screen. The operating rooms are elevated, and are safeguarded in every way to prevent a possible conflagration.

Ushers at the Royal are mulatto girls, nattily attired in white coats, white aprons and French caps. The water boy, who has nothing to do but quench the thirst of patrons, also is uniformed in white. Incidentally, the tumblers he carries are not of glass, but of paper, which are destroyed after once used. The color scheme at the Royal is old rose and ivory. The lighting facilities enhance the beauty of this, demonstrating that the direct system is not yet obsolete. Four great banquet lamps, seven feet from candle to candle, are suspended from the ceiling. The side walls are equipped with lights of the same design.

Adequate ventilating and heat have been supplied. What is known as the blast system of heating is used in cold weather, the heat being blown through a nine-foot air washer and discharged into mushrooms under the seats. In the summer, the same fan draws 14,000 cubic feet of air per minute through the washer, in which the temperature of the river is maintained. Also, 20,000 cubic feet of air is taken out through the ceiling every minute. Twenty side wall fans of the oscillating variety also help out in hot weather. Thirty employees are utilized in routine work at the Royal. There are thirteen musicians, two cashiers, three operators, four ushers, one maid, a water boy, two janitors, and two doormen.

The Royal Picture Theater Company, which is incorporated at $150,000, is made up of Frank L. Newman, president and manager; W. P. Fulkerson, treasurer, and T. H. Cochrane, secretary. The company has a ninety-nine year lease on the building, which cost about $75,000. The annual rental is $16,500, insurance and taxes bringing the figure to $19,000.

NEW ALASKA THEATER, SEATTLE, WASH.

THE accompanying photos show the New Alaska Theater, of Seattle, Wash., which is unquestionably one of the finest motion picture theaters to be found in the United States. Built at the cost of $120,000, no expense was spared to make the Alaska a model theater of its kind, and this object is witnessed by the complete construction. In many respects the Alaska is distinctive. The installation of its equipment has been acomplished in such a manner as to give the Alaska conveniences peculiar to itself. Added to this is the beauty followed in every detail of construction.

The front of the theater is built of mat-glazed terra cotta, set with beautifully stained glass windows. Above the entrance on both sides are two huge caldrons from which fire shines through glass clouds in the form of steam. They are so designed as to reflect from the polished exterior surface a magnificent sunset. The entrance and the outside foyer of the Alaska is finished in Onyx and marble. Every decoration is hand-painted, not a bit of stenciled decorating having been done. Probably the feature most noticeable in the interior is the lighting system, by which an indirect sunset effect in natural colors is reflected on the ceiling.

Alaska Theater, Seattle, Wash.

The second most notable feature is the richness and beauty of the immense curtain and draperies. These are of heavy red velvet, regally colored and artistically draped. The aisles and foyer of both the orchestra and balcony are wide and heavily carpeted.

There are seats to accommodate 1,100 persons, yet everyone of these has been so placed as to afford an unobstructed view of the screen. A noticeable thing about the seats is their unusual width and of their leather upholstering. No box seats or loges are found on the first floor, but on the balcony is a series of eight loges, fitted with wicker chairs, and there are three upper boxes on each side running from the balcony to the proscenium arch. Another respect in which the Alaska is distinctive is the arrangement of the aisles and exits with a view to avoiding congestion when large crowds are in attendance. Everywhere within the theater is so arranged as to afford ample space and convenient passage for the patrons to and from their seats.

Harmony and taste prevail in the interior decorations. All the frescoing is hand-painted and beautiful. The friezes to be seen on each side of the stage are very artistic. There is a latticed ceiling which conceals the $10,000 pipe organ, and a latticed "echo" in the rear of the balcony. While enough has been placed in the interior to avoid the slightest appearance of barrenness nothing has been overdone, and the harmony of the whole is not disturbed by color or arrangement. On the mezzanine floor a spacious rest room for women has been built of unusual size, and fitted with two full-length mirrors and numerous smaller ones. The room is complete in equipment, and handsomely furnished with white wicker furniture. It is provided with telephone and maid service.

A ventilating system is installed by which the air in the theater is completely changed every three minutes. Fresh air is drawn in through the roof and forced across heated coils, and is removed from the theater by means of immense suction fans. The building has been constructed entirely of Washington materials. It is of solid concrete, reinforced with steel, and but few structures on the Pacific Coast are so substantial in character. The theater is controlled by the Alaska Theater Company. The architects were W. H. Milner & Co., of Seattle, Wash.

WALTON THEATER, SELMA, ALA.

Built of stone, brick and marble and modern in every way, is the Walton Theater, Selma, Ala. It is under the management of W. K. Couch. The dimensions of the building are 40 by 90 feet, and the auditorium can accommodate 500, 122 of whom are in the balcony. The seats are thirty-six inches apart.

The size of the operating room is nine by twelve feet. The height of the ceiling is ten feet with a cone-shaped ventilator through the roof. Two Power's 6A projection machines are used, and they are motor-driven. The Walton was opened August 10.

APOLLO THEATER, PEORIA, ILL.

Beautiful $85,000 Picture House Recently Opened by Apollo Amusement Company Has Seating Capacity for 1,000.

PEORIANS have in the Apollo another new and splendid motion picture house. It is owned by the Apollo Amusement Company, Inc., 313 Grand street, Peoria, Ill. Dee Robinson is president and C. E. Carrier is the manager. The theater is valued at $85,000. It is situated in a city with a population of over 100,000 and ought to have no trouble in securing a large percentage of patronage by reason of its attractiveness and diversified entertainment. There are seating accommodations for 1,000 in the Apollo. The edifice is another of those structures which may claim the name of "picture theater beautiful." The lobby is a passageway of artistic effects. The walls are in Mosaic design and the decorations in other parts of the lobby are pleasing and in harmony with the general effect. The doors leading into the foyer are finished in art glass ornamentation.

On the interior walls, which are of brick and plaster and which add to the inviting effect of the auditorium, are immense oil paintings of Italian garden scenes between panels made of brick. These paintings are framed in brick borders which do not detract from the scene or make the painting look clumsy and are topped with a decoration of plaster. Each panel contains, at a height of about ten feet, a pendant electric light in an ornamental glass bowl. The panels are not plain, but are broken by broad bands of brick equidistant from one another and are an inch or so in depth.

In the orchestra as well as in the balcony there are two wide aisles running from front to back. All of the leather upholstered seats were bought of the Wisconsin Seating Company. As will be seen from the accompanying illustration of the interior, the pipes of the organ are divided into two sections, one on each side of the proscenium arch. In addition to this instrument an orchestra composed of women is used. The stage has been transformed into a beautiful garden scene which surrounds the mirror screen. The indirect lighting system is employed. In the fine big operating room, which is located in the back of the balcony, can be found the most up-to-date equipment among which are two motor-driven Motiograph machines.

In planning and building the Apollo great stress was laid on the ventilation system as well as on all other means of comfort and convenience for the patrons. Every breath of air that goes into the auditorium passes through a series of eight sprays of water, which not only collect and remove every particle of dust and impurity, but reduce the temperature 15 degrees below the intake thermometer reading. In the cool months, as the air leaves the sprays of water, it goes through warm radiator coils and then passes off into the auditorium.

The Apollo starts its first show at 11 a. m. and its last exhibition ends at 11 p. m. In order that no one may come into the theater during the exhibition of a multiple reel picture and be compelled to sit through that picture, seeing the last part first and the first part last, the management announces in conspicuous places in the lobby the time that each multiple reel picture is to be shown. The regular admission fee is 10 cents, though the price is occasionally raised when an extra big feature is booked.

PADUCAH'S $15,000 PICTURE HOUSE.

WITH the advent of last Spring there was opened at 417 Broadway, Paducah, Ky., a $15,000 moving picture theater by Rodney C. Davis. The new structure stands upon the site of Mr. Davis' old theater, the Kozy, which is the appellation bestowed upon the new edifice. The dimensions and seating room of the new theater are 26 by 150 feet with a seating capacity of 500, as compared with 20 by 90 feet and accommodations for only 240 of the razed house. The front of the Kozy is built of white enameled brick, which gives a clean and conservative appearance both day and night, but more especially in the evening, it would seem, when there are burning the numerous lights on the glass canopy which extends the full width of the sidewalk. The Kozy is modern in every way, and expense was not spared in giving the full quota of convenience to its patrons. The programs of the Kozy are strictly confined to moving pictures. The big Wurlitzer organ is one of the many features.

One of the daily papers of Paducah, paid editorial tribute to the edifice when the cornerstone was laid. "The laying of the cornerstone of a local 'movie' theater brings to mind forcefully the power of the modern picture show for good or for evil. To see one put down the foundation of its structure with prayer is a good sign, and an indication of what its power will be," is the way the editorial begins. The Rev. Clinton S. Quinn, rector of the Grace Episcopal church of Paducah, officiated at the ceremonies.

SALAMANCA TO HAVE BIG HOUSE.

J. C. Groat, of Salamanca, N. Y., who has owned and managed several picture houses in that city, has begun the erection of a big $25,000 picture house there. The dimensions of the structure are 70 by 140 feet, and it is expected that the theater will be opened by February 15, 1915.

DAY AND NIGHT SCREEN TO SAN ANTONIO.

We learn that shipment will be made within the next few days of one of the above screens for installation in the Brady theater of San Antonio, Texas. Our issue of October 17 contained some incorrect information in regard to the equipment of this house.

Crane Wilbur-Regular Fellow

By Thornton Fisher.

EVERY one present who believes in fate, stand up! All right, sit down! Anyway, fate has wrecked nations, devastated homes, built fortunes and cut tremendous capers in the life of the average man. If fate had not hauled C. Emerson Doodlewit to a given spot at the precise moment he doubtless would not have stopped the solid end of a descending brick.

All of which leads us to an interesting little biography which, if you will gather around, I will endeavor to relate.

Fate in the guise of an illness produced the big opportunity for a convalescent young actor who, at the solicitation of a friend, journeyed one day from the metropolis to Fort Lee, New Jersey, to visit him where it was expected he might recuperate.

His Start in the Hero Business.

Now the plot thickens, for here fate again dipped in its oar. Leaving the car the young Thespian struck out on foot through the suburban environs for the home of his acquaintance. He had proceeded but a short distance when his attention was arrested by a small boy who, quivering with excitement, pointed to a group of moving picture actors who were rehearsing a scene wherein the hero was apparently rescuing the beautiful heroine who, seated upon a runaway horse, was violently attempting to control the spirited animal. All went well and the director gave the word for the camera—click, click, click goes the instrument as the fair maid dashes madly away on her steed.

Down the road comes horse and rider, scattering behind them great clouds of dust and obscuring an astonished company of picture actors.

The realism is complete.

Frantically the young woman tugs at the reins and endeavors to retain her seat on the speeding beast. Where is the picture hero to save her? He has received his cue but fails to come to the girl's rescue. For this mock runaway has suddenly been transformed to one of horrible reality. The young convalescent instantly perceiving the seriousness of the situation leaps towards the approaching animal, grabs the flying reins, subdues the beast and lifts the fainting young lady from the saddle. The director and his corps hasten to the spot and shower congratulations upon the young fellow for his pluck. Thus Crane Wilbur became a real hero of the screen and landed his first job.

I spent an evening recently at Claridge's with this delightfully versatile star whose features are familiar to thousands of picture fans throughout the world.

Why then describe him? If Wilbur's personality is projected from the screen it is emphasized when one is in the presence of the actor.

He is still a young man, being but—well, at any rate on the sunny side of thirty, yet possessing a wealth of histrionic experience many veterans might envy. Crane was born in Athens, New York, and to use old stuff is a product of the soil.

He was raised on a farm, and that fact alone sufficiently explains his skill as an equestrian. If you want to catch Crane Wilbur at his best put him astride a fiery horse and turn him loose.

I put this question to Mr. Wilbur:

"What type of plays appeal to you most? Society or western pictures?"

Quick as a flash he shot back, "Give me the role in which rugged outdoor life is portrayed or where I can ride up before the camera on a dashing horse."

And he comes by it honestly.

His paternal ancestry is Indian, while on his mother's side he comes from English stock.

The secret of his success in Western scenes is largely due to his keen knowledge and familiarity with every corner of a horse, and there are few of these animals that Wilbur cannot subdue, for he has lived in the saddle. No wonder this rugged lad of the hills and fields has developed into strong virile manhood with a passion for red-blooded western drama. His early boyhood days were lived in Mink Hollow, way back in the Catskill Mountains, where sunrise was his alarm clock and sunset the curfew. Even in those days the boy in the rural environment dreamed of the stage and it was not unnatural that he should, for his uncle is the noted actor, Tyrone Power.

He first appeared as one of the crowd with Mrs. Fiske in "Mary of Madgala" about twelve years ago when he played a thinking part. Again Fate interfered. An accidental fall down a set of property steps his first night on the stage during a performance of the above play earned him a regular job "doing a brodie" down those same steps every night thereafter. Mrs. Fiske, who had witnessed it, instructed him to repeat it. It was not intended as a bit of comedy, however, for, as one of the throng, in the excitement of the moment, he would lose his balance and plunge to the bottom of the steps. Mr. Wilbur says he became quite an artistic tumbler after a little practice. "I began my rise by falling."

Some job, eh, massaging the stage eight times a week with your face!

From that humble position he procured roles in other well-known plays and rapidly ascended the dramatic ladder when fate dragged him into the pictures. Today Crane Wilbur is one of the most brilliant stars in the moving picture firmament, his work with the Pathe Freres having conspicuously established him as a leader in the hero business. He has won added popularity recently through his clever work in that famous film series "The Perils of Pauline," but one of his favorite pictures is "The Corsair," in which he starred. In the last-named play Mr. Wilbur's make-up was a revelation in that art.

What does he expect to do in the future? He hints that he may return to the speaking stage for a brief period next year, having received numerous tempting offers from that source as well as from several big film companies.

What are your impressions after knowing Crane Wlbur?

First, you are keenly disappointed that his pictures don't do him justice. You regret that the followers of the picture lose a large part of the interesting personality of the handsome young actor.. Second, and last, and this sums up the whole thing, Crane Wilbur is a regular fellow.

William S. Hart

WILLIAM S. HART, the illustrious Broadway favorite, is the latest acquisition to the ranks of Inceville. This interesting item of news came to light with an announcement made by Thomas H. Ince to the effect that Mr. Hart's name has been affixed to a contract; and Mr. Hart will begin, in the course of a few weeks, to direct and act in feature productions of the New York Motion Picture Corporation.

The services of Mr. Hart have been long sought by Mr. Ince, and an impetus was given the movement by the extraordinary work the celebrated thespian did in "The Two-Gun Man," a forthcoming release of the Ince companies. For that feature Mr. Hart was especially engaged, but his contract expired with the completion of the production. Mr. Ince immediately began negotiations with a view to obtaining Mr. Hart as a permanent adjunct to his forces.

William S. Hart.

It is the intention of Mr. Ince to collaborate with his scenario writers in constructing productions particularly adapted to the ability of Mr. Hart. The actor has been said to excel in western parts, although his early successes on the legitimate stage were scored in his interpretation of classical characters.

A comprehensive idea of the scope of Mr. Hart's experience in the classics may be gained from the fact that at a recent gathering of stage celebrities at a well-known New York actors' club he was declared to have played more classical roles than any other actor in America. Those checked to the credit of Mr. Hart were Marc Antony, Bassanio, Cassio, Phasarius, Iago, Lord Leicester, Angelo, Benedict, Macbeth, "The Man in the Iron Mask," Ingomar, Romeo, Orlando, Pygmalion, and Messala.

Mr. Hart's most complete triumph in a latter-day role perhaps was made as Cash Hawkins in "The Squaw Man," which part he originated. Later he appeared with great success in support of Charlotte Walker in "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine." His impersonation of the rugged westerner has been styled by many reviewers as the best piece of work of its kind that has ever been done.

As Mr. Hart's connection with "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine" drew to a close, Mr. Ince communicated an offer to him to appear before the camera. Weeks of dickering resulted in the actor signing a contract. His first appearance was made as a co-star with Robert Edeson and Rhea Mitchell in "On the Night Stage," and later he starred alone in "The Two-Gun Man." Both are Ince features that soon will be released.

The arrival of Mr. Hart will augment the list of Inceville directors to eight.

ALL STAR SIGNS JANE COWL.

The All Star Feature Corporation has signed a contract that ensures to that company the services of Jane Cowl. Miss Cowl is to appear in the picturization of Eugene Walter's play "The Easiest Way" which will be released by Alco Film Corporation. During the past year Miss Cowl has refused many offers from prominent moving picture concerns to appear on the film.

"Shorty" Finds His Mate

"SHORTY" HAMILTON, the mirth-maker of the Ince companies, is laboring under an avalanche of congratulations. He is being told that he is certain to make a good husband and that he has won the "sweetest" girl in the world and that he'll have nothing but good fortune. 'Cause "Shorty" went and got married. Yep, he's married, all right. In fact, he's very much married, for the ceremony was solemnized on Saturday, October 10th.

Behind "Shorty's" matrimonial venture is a romance of the unusual sort. He's a bit reticent about it, but when inveigled into a conversation exhibits a willingness to tell all about it. It happened like this:

About two months ago, "Shorty" was the honored guest at one of the moving picture theaters in Venice. His face is as well known as that of Buana Tumbo, and a big crowd gathered at the pictorium to extend felicitations when he stepped on the stage and tried to say that he can't help being funny.

In the audience sat a pretty lass, named Ethel Spurgint, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Al. Spurgint, of 524 East Twenty-third street, and member of the Burbank Stock Company. She had admired "Shorty" and his work on the screen ever since the noted comedian's face was projected by the motion picture machine. And she longed to meet him face to face.

She got her chance that very night. After the performance, "Shorty" was invited to attend a dance at a Venice home. So was Miss Spurgint. They met. They talked. And "Shorty" escorted Miss Spurgint to her home in his automobile. They met again. And talked again. And "Shorty" discovered that he was falling in love. But the unusual feature of his affair was that he told none about it. Not even his closest friends at Inceville knew aught of the match.

Last Saturday he asked Stanley Bingham and Miss Diana Carrillo to attend a little function at the Spurgint home. The invitation was accepted and when the two guests arrived they were introduced to Rev. J. C. Myers. Then they were asked to "stand up," which they did, while "Shorty" and his bride were united in wedlock.

ROLFE SIGNS MABEL TALIAFERRO.

Mabel Taliaferro is the latest recruit to the world of the screen. Contracts have been signed between Miss Taliaferro and B. A. Rolfe Photo Plays, Inc., whereby Miss Taliaferro will be seen in an early release of the Alco Program. The first picturization in which Miss Taliaferro will appear will be "The Three of Us," originally presented as legitimate offering at the Madison Square Theater in the days of its latter prosperity. It is a work in the earlier style of Rachel Crothers and had a run in New York for more than two years.

HUHN WAS IN "THE PATH FORBIDDEN."

268 W. 43d St., City, Oct. 19, 1914.

Editor Moving Picture World, New York City:

Dear Sir—From the first day of operations, I was a member of the Excelsior Film Company of Lake Placid, N. Y., and stayed with them until the completion of the picture entitled "The Path Forbidden," shown at the Hammerstein Lexington Theater, New York.

I played the principal heavy part in said picture, but for some reason the management has seen fit to drop my name entirely from the cast and substituted the name of James Albaugh in the role of "The Tout." By looking at your issue of the last of May you will find a group picture of the entire company, and you will find my name under my position.

Anything you can and will do to rectify this mistake I will greatly appreciate. I am, respectfully yours,

A. O. HUHN.

WOULDN'T MISS A SINGLE NUMBER.

Red Cloud, Nebraska, Oct. 13, 1914.

Dear Sirs:—I inclose herewith check for $3 in renewal of my subscription to the Moving Picture World.

I value your paper very highly and do not want to miss a single number. To be without it an exhibitor would be in about the same predicament as a sailor without compass and rudder. Yours truly, GEO. J. WARREN.

Lasky Goes to Coast

Takes a Private Car Load of Directors and Photoplayers with Him.

ONE of the largest motion picture parties to leave for the coast, at one time, was that which left the Pennsylvania station Friday, October 30th, in charge of Jesse L. Lasky, president of the Lasky Feature Play Company, and which was composed of Lasky players only. The private car "Filipino" was engaged by General Manager Goldfish of the Lasky company and eighteen persons will make the trip to Los Angeles without stopping over.

Jesse L. Lasky.

Jesse L. Lasky, head of the company, will remain at the Lasky studios for four weeks to watch and aid in the staging of the producing facilities and the staging of Harold MacGrath's "The Goose Girl" which will be an early release of that firm.

Another director, a member of the trans-continental party, to join the Lasky staff, is Frederick Thomson, the former Vitagraph and Famous Player's director, who will, immediately upon arrival at Hollywood, begin work on "Merely Mary Ann," in which Marguerite Clarke will play the leading role. During the connection of Mr. Thomson with the Famous Players' Film Company he produced the "Sign of the Cross" and "The Spitfire," and while with Vitagraph was responsible for many of the better features created by that concern.

Frederick Thomson.

Winifred Kingston.

Edith Taliaferro, the dainty, younger member of the famous Taliaferro sisters, well remembered from their work in "Polly of the Circus," "Young Wisdom," "Springtime," "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," "Tipping the Winner," and other Klaw and Erlanger-Joseph Brooks' productions was among the travelers and will make her first screen appearance in "The Goose Girl."

Dustin Farnum, an exclusive Lasky star, will travel as far as Chicago with the Lasky party, when he will divert to one of the Southern roads for New Orleans where he will join Oscar Apfel who is now there and where Farnum will pose for a few Mississippi River scenes which are essential in the Lasky-Leibler production of Cameo Kirby which Farnum played in during its stage vogue.

Winifred Kingston, seen in "The Squaw Man," "Brewster's Millions," "The Only Son," "The Call of the North," "The Virginian," and several other Lasky productions, goes to New Orleans with Farnum and a cameraman. Miss Kingston will play the leading female role opposite Farnum in Cameo Kirby. From New Orleans, Farnum, Apfel, the cameraman and Miss Kingston will journey to Los Angeles via the Southern Pacific.

Marguerite Clarke, who appears with the Lasky Company by reason of an arrangement with Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players' Film Company, accompanied by her sister, is a member of the private car personnel and will begin work on "Merely Mary Ann" just as soon as she arrives at Hollywood.

In addition to the stars and Mr. Lasky, the party contains two wardrobe women, a designer of costumes and two expert "period" seamstresses who will be used in arranging the wearing apparel of the artists appearing in "Cameo Kirby," which is an Ante-Bellum play and deals with a Mississippi River gambler before the Rebellion.

There are now eighteen stars, five directors and five cameramen at the Lasky studio, not to mention eighty permanent members of the Lasky stock companies.

Blanche Austin

Lasky's Motion Picture Novitiate Who Is Taking Lessons of Belasco.

A NEW and wonderful future opened before little Blanche Austin, of Dayton, O., who arrived in New York last Friday to begin a course of instructions under David Belasco, preparatory to becoming a member of the photoplay stock company of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company at Hollywood, Cal.

The arival of Miss Austin in New York is the last whispering recollection of the exhibitors' convention at Dayton, Ohio, during which time the Dayton Herald, through arrangement with Samuel Goldfish, conducted a beauty contest, the winner of which, was to be given an engagement at the Lasky studios. Miss Austin was successful in competition with twelve hundred other Dayton girls, and will begin her instructions next week under Mr. Belasco, with whom she will spend one hour a day.

Blanche Austin.

Miss Austin is but seventeen years of age, frail and with features that should register sympathetically upon the screen. Her huge brown eyes, diminutive features, frail, dainty structure and expressive countenance were compelling inducements to the committee, which decided that she was more fitted for the screen than any of the other thousand odd entrants in the contest.

General Manager Samuel Goldfish of the Lasky organization selected Mary Charleson as chaperone for Miss Austin, during her month's stay here, and Miss Charleson has mapped out an excellent program of entertainments.

DALLAS FILM CO. TAKES KINETOPHOTE PRODUCT.

The K. C. Booking Co., Incorporated, which handles all of the features made or otherwise controlled by the Kinetophote Corporation of 126 West 46th street, signed contracts this week with C. R. Scott, of the Dallas Film Company, of Dallas, Texas, to take all of the output of the Kinetophote for Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana and Arkansas. These contracts, Mr. Scott said, make the Dallas Film Company the biggest exchange in the Southwest as well as the one having the most extensive affiliations in the big southwestern territory.

Mr. Scott was very optimistic about conditions in the Southwest. He remarked that the exchanges in that large slice of the United States were expecting the biggest business in years this fall and winter.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Want A Booster?

EVIDENTLY the Golden Age is drawing near. Here is a manager who is willing to loan an advertising device to brothers in the same territory, and without other charge than the freight. He is F. D. Stanton, of the Orpheum theater, Gardner, Mass., and his letter is self explanatory.

Under separate cover I have mailed a photograph of an automobile which we built a short time ago. The stunt not only created a lot of comment but proved a business getter of the number one order.

If any of our brother exhibitors would care to have the use of the machine for a few days, it will only be necessary to drop me a line stating that they will pay the freight one way, keep the machine in repair and ship promptly to the next fellow on hearing from me.

The machine is thoroughly manageable and your life, not forgetting your avoirdupois, would really be safer with me in this rig than on the hind seat of friend Richardson's gohellie.

The uprights, shafts, etc., are all made of hardwood.

The signs are well made (there are four of them), covered with oilcloth and can be pasted over with paper signs.

Of course this ad is small time stuff, but it might be noticed by two or three persons even on Broadway if you and Bunny should take a little spin down that more or less well known village lane some Sunday afternoon.

In other words, if you get the machine from Mr. Stanton you pay the freight. Then the second man on the list pays the freight from you to himself and so on until, some day, the 'boil gets back to the home town. This is a very handsome offer and one that indicates a growing spirit of friendliness and brotherhood.

That Missing Paragraph.

The Ladies' World and the Essanay company seem to be working close together. They did One Wonderful Night and now the guessing contest for the missing paragraph is another business-getter for magazine, Essanay and the exhibitor. The Ladies' World was the first of the magazines to realize the value of the motion picture for mutual advertising. It originated the What Happened to Mary and the sequel, it originated the first voting contest conducted by a non-subsidized magazine, and now the prize contest is the third development. Other magazines will probably follow suit, but the Ladies' World will hold the lead not merely because it was the first, but because it has given a lot of study to the subject and springs its schemes after mature deliberation. What Happened to Mary was the result of more than a year of previous study of pictures and photoplay theaters. You do not have to run the subject the day the magazine appears, but when the issue comes, paste the story on a bulletin and announce "coming" or the date. Then work it up on the screen. That's all the bother you have—other than the sale of tickets, which is a most pleasant way of being bothered. It is interesting to note the change of front the daily periodical press has executed. Now they help instead of fight the photoplay.

A War Map.

Bernard Rackmill, of the Isis theater, Seattle, Wash., not only sends a photograph of the crowd in front of the house in the morning, but he sends a corking good print—which makes us love him twice as much. Mr. Rackmill got a large war-zone map and indicates the position of the forces by means of various colored pins, the latter being changed as the front moves. If he can get them, the tiny flags now sold for the same purpose will be even better, but they may not have reached the west as yet. The main point is that he has a crowd like that around the house all the morning, and very naturally they cannot get away without being cognizant of the house and the current attractions. The man who is not looking at the map, the one with his hands behind his back, is Mr. Rackmill himself. We take it that he manages to get a modest advertisement of the house or attractions on the map itself where it will not interfere with the combatants and it is also to be supposed that he keeps it strictly up to date. During the Boer War we were in London and there, at the clubs and in a few stores, the map was changed in accordance with each bulletin. If you use a map, get it up to date and keep it that way.

Realizing a Dream.

Edmund Reid, originator of the one side daily paper program, of Milledgeville, Ga., is back in the game with a new house to replace the Palace, which burned last May. The newcomer is the Colonial, and Mr. Reid writes:

Wish to say that I will send you a photo shortly of Dixieland's prettiest photoplayhouse lobby—bar none. That's some remark, but wait and see. I have the pleasure of giving the public something I have dreamed of for three years—and it exceeds my fondest hope.

Well, we'll wait, but we'll remember, and Mr. Reid had better make good. The opening was delayed that the full installation might be at hand, but it did open and it made good. The daily paper is now the Colonial Daily News, and it starts with Vol. 1, No. 1. Number three announces the purchase of a motion camera and promises the showing of local views. Some day soon the operator will have to be able to run the camera, too. Then listen to Brother Richardson's remarks. The Saturday issue gives the church services for the following day, which naturally does no hurt.

Getting A Hustle On.

The Third Street theater, Easton, is getting some opposition, and they are buckling down to the fight. Their two pages devoted to miscellany is now given up to a running story of the week's offerings. This being the case, it would pay them to put in four more pages, give more space to the second house of their string and whoop it up. The program always has been interesting. We expect to find it more so, now.

More Montgomery.

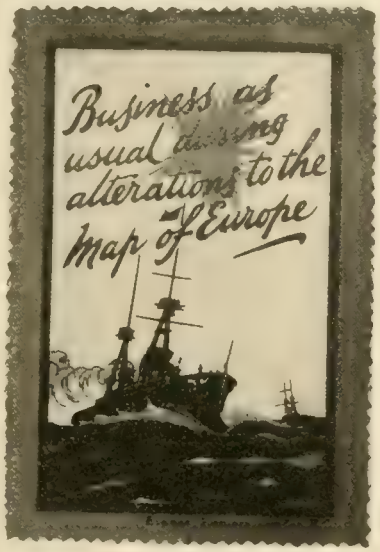
Frank T. Montgomery sends in a copy of the Tampa Times in which he gets all but one column of a Sunday page, and that general reading. This is three and a half columns of advertising, mostly for the Paramount stuff, and two and a half of reader, including nearly a column from The Theater of Science. That's going some, but it is the Montgomery way.

Paramount Pickings.

Paramount Pickings is coming along nicely, thanks. We hope to be able to quote from it presently, but just now it is sticking too close to home.

Sid Olcott Sends.

Sid Olcott, just back from the other side, and profusely glad he did not have to walk, sends in a clever advertisement put out by T. H. Davidson, of London. It is a generous sample of Khaki (perhaps Sid used it as a mattress coming over) with an appeal to British patriots to use British films. That would not work so well over here, but it might be adapted to local conditions, perhaps with an American flag, to counteract the foreign features, just now. It runs an advertisement of a couple of patriotic films. More clever still is an advertising stamp, which is reproduced. This is one of the best things we have caught from the other side yet. Perhaps Mr. Olcott has told the rest of the staff how he got home. Getting back home is not the most popular pastime.



Get Out, the Rest of You.

We think this must be IT.
Princess theater,
Southern Pines, S. C.
Population 500 "including babies."

Quo Vadis, Last Days of Pompeii and Paramount program, one a week all summer and now two a week at 15 and 25 cents.

It's going to take a gosh-blamed small town to beat that. The answer is a mailing list that covers a radius of 18 miles.

Just to rub it in, the house opened last December with a home-made musical comedy that Manager Charles W. Picquet wrote and at dollar prices. You fifteen hundred and two thousand chaps please go stand in the hall until the census falls off.

We think So.

After the upheaval that followed the Quo Vadis discussion, we are not giving out any more records, but this is the first time that we have heard of photoplay theater tickets being given out by a Sunday School as a reward. The claimants are Kalina and Sergel, managers of the Rex theater, Buhl, Montana. And by the same token, Mr. Sergel wants to hear from Eller Metzger, who used to manage the Casino, Des Moines, Ia. If Mr. Metzger is in the audience will he please come to the platform? Anyhow, Mr. Sergel writes:

> "Free tickets to a moving picture theater the reward for attending Sunday School."
> Does this establish a precedent?
> Enclosed clipping from a Buhl paper contains such an offer made by the Buhl Methodist Sunday School. Indirectly this is the result of having Buhl's sky pilots on the Rex free list and convincing them of our ambition to always present clean, wholesome and instructive programs.
> From personal knowledge I can say that the duties of "24 hour man" with a thirty car trick are easy to some of the difficulties that confront many a small town exhibitor.

We don't know what a "24 hour man" is, nor yet a "30 car trick," but it listens hard and we'll admit that the path of the exhibitor is not strewn with roses, but paragraphs like this help some:

> Pastor Hardin announces that a treat has been arranged for every boy and girl present at Sunday School next Sabbath. At the regular Sunday School session tickets will be given out admitting the boys and girls to a moving picture exhibition to be given at the Rex Wednesday. Every boy and girl will want to be present in the Sunday School next Sunday and receive one free ticket of admission.

It comes in a column of church news instead of the run of the paper and is read by those most apt to still oppose amusement in any form. It is good work.

A Handsome D. K.

Ralph R. Ruffner of the American, Butte, Mont., comes in with an attractive D. K. It is a cut-out in the shape of a bag of money. On one side is a $ in a wreath and above $10,200. On the other is the announcement of the grand prize in the Million Dollar Mystery and the local prize, the reason for which Mr. Ruffner shrewdly points out. Among the millions of patrons of the photoplay theaters, there is a small chance of any particular community getting in the money, but with a local prize hung up, the lure of the $200 is greater than the offer of $10,000, for some one in that territory will get that prize. Mr. Ruffner writes:

> Am enclosing herewith two door-knob hangers which we used here in Butte with very satisfactory results. As is the inevitable result in running serial pictures, there are always a few who begin right and follow the story for a few weeks, but when they commence to drop off, it is up to the exhibitor to hold them.
> Anticipating this, we made an additional offer of $200 to the man, woman or child residing in Silver Bow County who can write in 100 words the solution of the Million Dollar Mystery coming nearest the one winning the grand prize of $10,000. Detailed instructions, you will note we say, to be found in the Sunday Standard, where we have a half page ad and in which section of the paper will be found the story.
> Only 2,000 of these money sacks were put out, but they were distributed by our man under instructions to take his time and do the job right. We have found that the scheme has increased our receipts in a substantial manner, with better results than had we placed 12,000 heralds indiscriminately.
> As in the past, when I thought other exhibitors might profit by my ideas—as I have theirs—through your columns—I again offer to send to any address a sample of these hangers as long as the limited supply holds out. It is necessary to say, however, that a self-addressed envelope with a good stamp thereon, always brings a more prompt reply.
>
> Will have a photo taken of our lobby showing another line of publicity of the M$M this afternoon and shoot it in later.

Up Against It.

Walter L. Murphy, of the Star theater, Two Harbors, Minn., is up against a funny proposition, as his letter explains:

> We are enclosing a herald that we had printed here at home announcing the fact that we were going to try some of the REALLY BIG Features and that we were going to raise the price.
> It seems rather hard to raise the price here owing to the fact that this is a railroad town and only twenty-eight miles from Duluth. Practically all families work for the company and hold passes on which they ride to Duluth and see the best that's made for ten cents, and sometimes for five cents.
> You would be surprised to find how hard it is to make them see that it is impossible for us here at home to give the same performances for the same money that the exhibitors do in Duluth.

It is a condition much the same as in the city where the people pay ten cents to go downtown and back to see the same stuff at one of the centre houses. It is no better, and sometimes not as good, but they feel they are having an outing. In this case it does not even cost carfare.

The circular is an excellent example of clean cut argument. Although set in display, it reads straight through from the top of page one to the bottom of page four without interruption. It starts off with the declaration that the war has not yet raised the price of film and a 48 point "BUT" adds that the manufacturers have raised the price as have the exchanges. It goes on to say that there has been a demand for features and so the theater has arranged to present a few at a slightly increased price and abide by the result. It announces the first feature, the coming attractions and adds:

> Do not think for one minute that because some of the big productions are exhibited in Duluth for less than we charge that we can do the same here. The charge for all moving pictures is made by the DAY, regardless of the size of the town or the number of times it is run through the machine. In Duluth most of the picture houses start running in the forenoon and run continuously all day, paying no more for a day's rent on a film than we would pay for the same film the same day in Two Harbors.

This last is a possible weak point, but under the circumstances seems to be necessary. One point we like is the announcement that the shows will start at 7-30 and 9, adding, "We will run a comedy first, making the Big Feature start at 7-50 the first time and 9-15 the second time." There seems to be hope for success, for Mr. Murphy adds that there was a better turnout for The Lion and the Mouse than came to a sex play which started things off.

It would seem that some scheme should be possible to grade the scale of prices to fit the house, and yet the film has a certain earning capacity that bears no relation to the earning capacity of the theater.

McCormick A Press Man.

S. Barrett McCormick, whose editorial comments have frequently been reproduced in this department, and who has been largely instrumental in getting Denver theater managers to get above the five-cent limit for features, has been engaged by the Continental Feature Film Company of Denver to conduct a press bureau for the benefit of its patrons. He will supply the clients of the company with real newspaper press matter in place of the fulsome praise of the manufacturer's press agent (few of whom write with proper restraint), or the nothing at all that seems to be the alternative. Mr. McCormick is a real newspaper man and his engagement by the Continental is a fine feather in their cap.

Program Stuff.

Here is a paragraph from Reel-ism, the house organ of the Orpheum theater, Nampa, Idaho, that might be used to advantage in other programs:

> If you save this little paper you can always turn to the third page and see what the show is like for THAT night. Maybe there will be something on that you would like to see and would otherwise not have known about. On the other hand, maybe there will be something on that you would NOT want to see. In that case you will stay away, and we will be glad of it, for we would rather have you do that than to come and be disappointed.

The last sentence will be a friend-maker, and friends mean money to a house. Reel-ism used it only once. It would pay to make it a standing announcement.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter, which should be addressed to this department. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will full manuscripts or synopses be criticized, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

Multiple Leaders.

What might be termed the multiple leader has started to become a nuisance. By multiple is meant the two to four-sentence leader used with identifications in place of the single sentence leader. It looks something like this if you have not seen it:

Editor—This leader's too long.
Cutting man—I know it. What then?
Director—I'll fix it.
Editor—How?
Director—I'll write seven leaders.

When a man gets so blamed lazy that he cannot spend some little time getting all this in a single sentence, it is time for his boss to fire the loafer and hire some one else, but because it is easy and saves some indolent cheater a little thought, we are getting more and more all the time.

People do not go to the theater to read long stretches of dialogue. They go to see a story told in pictured motion. If the present fad keeps up they will get tired of being imposed on. It's just plain downright loafing or else a confession of weakness.

No matter how much you may see it done, don't get the habit.

Work, Some More.

We've been expecting it, and it has happened. It came the other day and it says:

> You say work and nothing but work will bring success. You say you have worked a long time. Yet Elaine Sterne got a prize in two contests and your name was not even mentioned. She's been working less than a year.

In the first place we did not try for either contest in spite of invitations to come in. Had we won the prize a lot of people would have said the contest was "fixed." Had we entered and failed there would have been more and other comment.

In the second place Miss Sterne, in spite of her unusual success, must do her full stint of work to gain permanent success. It is the average that counts in the long run and Miss Sterne will have to keep on working just the same as the veriest novice. We are inclined to think that back of her year in photoplay stand long years of preparation. The fact that she won $1,500 in prizes during her first year does not mean that work is not necessary.

Don't ease up your conscience with any such fallacious argument. It is only through work that success comes and nothing that is offered in bottles, books or packages is "just as good." Accept no substitutes.

Van Powell on Comedy.

A. Van Buren Powell is contributing a genuinely funny series of letters to the Photoplay Author. They are supposed to be from a bell boy who graduated into the office of a film company to a friend who is still hopping bells and trying to write scripts. The last letter sums up the comedy idea:

> If you kan think up a funny comidy with me for the hero insted of you ship it along. And remember it aint comidy to have a gink tip up on a bananer piel and slam his koko against a krait of egs just bekaws you think of it. But if you maik him to do it whial he is bringin his gurls old man sum sigars to make a hit so he kan marie the chicken and if the egs belong to the old geezur—then its comidy. Rite sum and I wil tel you if you hav got the idear into your knut.

In other words, it is not the action alone, but the relation of the action to the story that makes for comedy. Once this fact is thoroughly assimilated, the rest is merely a matter of practice and imagination.

Changing.

Suppose that you take a cupful of vinegar. Taste it. Now put in some tarragon leaves. Taste it again. Not quite the same, is it? Now a dash of tobasco! Another change in the taste. Some mustard! Still more change. Add some salt! Again a new solution. And yet it is vinegar for the greater part.

Take an old theme. Add something new. Add more new stuff. Add other novel factors. Look at it. It is the old theme still, but it looks different.

It's jussas easy!

Personal Interest.

This morning came a lady who sought to enlist our "personal interest" in her work, because she had purchased a copy of Technique.

Last week a lady wrote that she was not a subscriber, buying her paper on the news stand, and did not know if her letter would be replied to.

We do not know just what the writer intended by "personal interest," but we are interested in any person who is making an honest and sincere effort to master photoplay. It does not matter whether or not that person owns a copy of Technique or is a subscriber to this paper. If you have knots you cannot untie, send them along, but send an addressed return envelope, too. Our "personal interest" grows cold when it comes to addressing envelopes. We were helped over the bumps when we started and we want to pass the help along, and the only thanks we ask is that you do not ask the same question twice and that you ask questions intelligently. Don't be afraid to come in, but do not send synopses or scripts. Our price for criticizing a reel is $25 and it is not worth anything like that sum.

Be Explicit.

Here is a scene from a recent submission. It is selected from several examples because it is brief and simple. The scene runs:

18—Sitting room. John enter with Harry. He takes money from table. They both exit.

Who takes the money from the table? On form it would seem to be John, for he "enters with Harry," therefore it is supposed that he leads in the next action. Had it read "John and Harry enter" there would be a question of doubt, but the phrase suggests that John leads in the action and it is to be presumed that he continues to lead the action. As a matter of fact, a little further along Harry is directed to give John the money. The writer spoke of Harry last, therefore the "He" refers to Harry and not to John. Of course the later scenes explains the matter, but it does not always happen that there is a later scene to explain. It would be just as easy to write:

18—Sitting room—John and Harry enter. John takes money from table. Both exit.

This is definite; explicit. It is well, from the very start, to cultivate the habit of explicit statement. In the long run it is easier to write in this fashion

Old Themes.

It is to be expected that the novice will, unconsciously, hit on old ideas at first. These are the ones that first suggest themselves to all writers, and until experience is gained, the beginner does not know that they are so very old, but there are some other plots that are based on stories so old that there is no excuse for anyone using them, and it can only be supposed that the person offering them does so, knowing that he is offering old material. Only the other day a man wanted help. As a sample of what he could do he used the story of the mustard plaster that is put on the wrong man. Another is the woman who thinks there are burglars in the house, but it proves to be the cat. Under date of July 11, 1664, Samuel Pepys writes in his diary:

> About eleven o'clock, knowing what money I have in the house, and hearing a noise, I begun to sweat worse and worse, till I melted almost to water. I rung and could not in half an hour make either of the wenches hear me; and this made me fear the more lest they might be gag'd. * * * At last Jane rose and then I understand it was only the dog wants a lodging, and so made a noyse.

Once before his wife was alarmed by the noise of rats and he records that his wife's maid came to the Navy Office to call him home. It is a far cry from 1664 to now, and yet thirty or forty scripts a year are sent in carrying this same idea.

And yet, perhaps, the same idea might be gotten over now if there was an actual alarm at the door if some inebriate should see on the door a sign, "meals at All Hours," placed there by some joker.

Learning.

One recent visitor came to request that he be given access to some studio that he might study production and thereby learn how to write scripts and he was surprised to be advised that it was not to be done that way. There are others who feel, with him, that if they only could see pictures made they could write, but there must first be the serious study of the rules of technique. Each time we go to Jacksonville the players bring their scripts for comment, and it is seldom that they observe the simplest rules, though they constantly appear in pictures. Studio experience, like sample scripts, is good only when applied intelligently. Some of the best writers never saw a picture produced, so do not grieve over your supposed lack of opportunity.

A Suggestion.

Writing from a small town, a correspondent said:

> About all I can afford to invest in the writing game—outside my time, is the subscription to The Moving Picture World and one or two shows a week. I suppose that is all I really need, but there is a nightly change of bill and sixty cents a week looks large just now.

Perhaps there are others in much the same situation who might profit by the reply. Here is the essential part.

> The fact that you have only time to spend might lead you to invest part of that time very profitably. Most houses do more or less advertising. Many cannot afford a press agent and yet the manager cannot do the writing himself. Suppose you offer to do his press work for him in return for your admission and access to the material sent him by the various manufacturers? If you make really good, perhaps later on you can make the position pay something, but meantime you are not only studying the films but the audience and the mass of literature that is sent out by the makers. If you can write simply and interestingly, you can do more than the average exhibitor can, and perhaps he will make you welcome. Certainly he should.

Looking Ahead.

Some of these days there is going to be a market—and a good one—for advertising ideas, not ideas for advertising film subjects, but film subjects for advertising various commodities. Right now there are a lot of one-reel films and some running to five or six thousand feet, but as we see it, there is going to be a demand sometime for a snappy subject that bears the same relation to the thousand-foot subject as the anecdote does to the fifteen-hundred-word story, a snappy pointing up of an advertising moral.

Perhaps right now some of the national advertisers would be interested in this sort of one and two-minute stuff that would catch and hold the attention where an eighteen-minute film would not. It should not take a thousand feet, for example, to show that a patent fastener is better than a button and buttonhole.

You might be thinking this sort of stuff over against the time the idea gets ripe. One of these days every department store is going to have its motion picture auditorium to supplement the newspaper advertising, and ideas will be bought just as advertising ideas are now purchased. It is a photoplay writer, for instance, who turns out some of the best advertising ideas for cigarette advertising.

Assimilation.

Comes A. R. Lloyd to remark:

> One thing that has dawned on me just lately is that it is not only necessary to study and absorb what you teach, but to learn to apply such knowledge.

That's the whole secret. It is not so much what you know as what you know what to do with it that counts. We've known a lot of "mental marvels" in our time, and the late Felix Berol was about the only one who could do anything with what he knew. Most of them absorb facts but cannot make use of them. Many photoplay students cram their minds with the rules, and all sorts of good advice, but they do not take advantage of what they have gained. We know one student who can repeat almost verbatim our chapters on plotting and construction, and yet who makes the most hideous blunders. It is not enough to know the rules. You must learn to apply them. You can own a hammer and some nails and not be a carpenter, but a carpenter will drive a nail with a stone at a pinch.

Suppose that for a little time you stop studying more rules and learn to make practical application of those you already know.

Some Day.

One New Yorker sums up his experience with the eight stories he has done since last December and adds:

> Lastly I have sketched and planned about 15 to 25 possible plots covering: a—historical, b—Indian, c—Mexican, d—Labor, e—social and civic problems, f—educational.

Now altogether, little chillun, what chance does he stand with a lay-out like that? Correct. No chance at all. Historicals can be done by the staff, there is small demand for Indians and Mex stories, and these are now done only when some studio writer is too lazy to write a good plot, the labor problem is loaded at both ends and liable to explode in the middle besides, educationals are on special order and civic and social problems are apt to be too local, even for this country.

Some day, it may be, that list will be correct, but at the present time, the list should read:

Comedies with universal appeal.
Heart interest stories with universal appeal.
Dramas with universal appeal.

Any other wants than these will be filled by the studio writers or on order from the Editor.

Getting the Habit.

Perhaps this extract from a recent letter will be helpful to others. It went out with a couple of plots, the first the man at the other end had written.

> It was not to be expected that these first scripts would be just right. You must not only know what a plot is, but what you do with it. Your second synopsis has two possible endings. You have selected the more obvious of the two. The trick is to get a third and wholly unsuspected ending. It can be done, but before it can be done you must get the plotting habit, in that you must not only be able to think of an idea but to twist and reshape it until it becomes a wholly new idea, or at the least a seemingly new idea. This is something that comes only with practice, that comes only when you get so used to getting up ideas that it becomes a habit and your only task is to give them newness.

In other words, you first learn to plot and then learn to develop the plot intelligently. It is seldom that you can, from the start, not only plot, but develop uniquely, and since you cannot develop unless you first have a plot, get the plotting habit and then learn to make the plot out of the ordinary.

Please Do Not Use Clips.

This line is intended for editorial employees and not for authors.

Most editors have ceased to mark up scripts and it is seldom that our once current "Use no hooks" is now called into play. Now, why not go a step further and avoid the use of disfiguring clips?

One company, no matter what sort of clip is used by the author, puts a huge clip on the top of each script to fasten the rejection slip. The final mark of respect is to use two clips, though once we saw three used, and the script had to be ironed out before it could be sent out again.

This is unfair. The script has not been purchased. It remains the property of the author and it is unjust to him to brand it with the mark of a clip. As well stamp "rejected" across the face of the front page. A clip is not needed, at best. The script is to go right back into the envelope and it would be sufficient to fold the slip in with it. The really thoughtful editor throws the clip on the floor the moment he takes it from the script. He does not replace it with another. Not to use clips would be to save time and money as well as scripts.

Why not?

Crudities.

One apt phrase in a recent Dramatic Mirror criticism might be taken to heart by all writers. The critic is commenting on a feature made for propaganda purposes by the savings banks people. The paragraph reads:

> Thrift is the subject, and to show the effects of not saving, all but the thrifty are shown as drunkards.

Objection is made that the possession of a savings bank account is not the sign of the temperate or the lack of it a stamp of the curse of drink. The subject was aimed at the man without a bank account and to suggest that he would fill a drunkard's grave unless he started one is to affront the very persons the propagandist seeks to reach.

There is far too much of this crude drawing, not alone in propaganda stories but in dramas in general. In an effort to establish a point the agony is laid on too thick. If the husband is a brute he throws friend-wife about so continuously that the audiences begin to think she should be used to it by this time. If a man is supposed to be a gambler, every other scene shows him at the table. It's crude. In a late release the reversions of the hero to the gay life are all done by means of a single club setting. Each time the hero wishes to break away from the primrose path, he goes to the same club, sits at the same table and plays with the same pack of cards. The first and even the second time is all right, but the third should be replaced by a private game and a couple of scenes in public rooms would help. Five or six breaks to the same table grows tiresome.

Don't be crude. Don't hang up labels. Be suggestive, cunningly suggestive, and you'll be vastly more effective.

Your Script.

"They seem to think they must sell the first script before they can write the second," is the way an author summed up some of his acquaintances the other day and scores of letters speaking of "my script" carries the same idea. It is not a question of script, but of scripts. Do not try to sell the first script. You stand small chance at best, and it will be a misfortune for you if you do. Get a shoe box full and then start in to work up the best of these ideas.

New Schools.

Now comes the new fake school. This is not a widely advertised concern but the personally conducted affair. There is one such up in New York State—possibly more, but this one we know of. The class is conducted by a man who runs a business college. He charges $15 for the books of the course and one dollar for each script typed for the pupil.

Now, this might be all right if the "professor" knew enough to help the pupil, but one of them writes that he offers little or no comment on the work, but pursues the even course of "good" and "very good" that requires no demonstration, with the result that when the unfortunate pupil gets tired of paying a dollar a script for copying or learns to do the typing at home, he or she is turned loose on the business and thoroughly convinced that the work is all that it should be and that a lack of sales is due to the general crookedness of the business and not to any lack of merit in the script.

These schools are springing up everywhere and are adding to the already long list of pseudo authors who make no progress because they have been assured that their work is good and believe the statements.

The idea is not altogether new. Two summers ago the Lubin Comedy Company came north for the summer. On their return there were a number of people hanging around the Jacksonville studio. Some were graduates of a school of acting and others script graduates of the same school, and all had contracts to work for Lubin through the winter. A pair of slick swindlers had started to work almost as soon as the company had left the town and all summer they plied their trade, getting out just before the company returned. They were criminally liable because they uttered fictitious contracts, but the school that does no more than promise to teach photoplay writing, knowing this to be impossible, is within the law. It's worse than a pity. It's a disgrace.

Question No. 58.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Why is it that when insulated wires are strung on insulators in the open they must be kept a certain minimum distance apart, whereas they may be, and are, placed side by side in a conduit? Is the inside of a conduit insulated? Is it permissible to place two wires of different circuits or the wires of two circuits in one conduit? Is it permissible to place the three wires of a three-wire circuit in one conduit? Explain these things.

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question 52 consists of: Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Tex.; A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Wash., and Montreal, Can., and J. T. Roberts, Nashville, Tenn.

I have selected the reply of Brother Stewart as most nearly correct. It is brief but covers the matter very well. The replies have shown a surprising difference in opinion. Nine out of ten of the correspondents seem to have the idea that copper oxidizes when exposed to the elements. This is only true to a very, very slight degree, there being copper roofs in existence which have been untouched for hundreds of years and in perfectly good condition as yet, and the copper is not thick, either.

Reply to Question No. 52.

By A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Wash.

The Question:

What is the effect, both mechanically and electrically, of heat on copper? Does or does not a copper wire which is kept within its rated capacity deteriorate with time? For instance: Suppose your old theater was fed by one-fourth of a mile of No. 2 uninsulated wires. These wires you were compelled to supply. They had been in use for six years, supplying the old theater. Finally you built a new house. Would or would you not renew the feeders, assuming they had never been worked above their capacity? How could you determine this matter?

The Answer:

The mechanical effect of heat on copper is to decrease its tensile strength and make it brittle. Electrically it increases the resistance temporarily, and if the heat is excessive the conductivity of the wire will be permanently lowered; also high temperature will cause the formation of a scale, presumably an oxide, which has high resistance, and which will make itself felt at all connections. As this scale is partially composed of copper, very naturally its formation reduces the area of the wire, and in this way lowers its carrying capacity. An uninsulated copper wire which has not been loaded above its capacity would be practically in the same condition after six years as when it was brand new. The only deterioration would be a film of tarnish so very thin that it would be negligible. I would certainly use such wires for the new house. If in doubt as to the condition of the wires I would bend a piece back and forth to test its "life," and also by scraping the surface slightly you could tell by its color whether it had been abused or not.

Montreal in his reply says: "The wires could be tested by connecting up enough lamps or projection arcs to load the line, or overload it, and we could then see if it would deliver its rated ampere capacity."

[Montreal started out all right, but he did not wind up correctly. He should have said that the line could be loaded to its ampere capacity and then tested for voltage drop. However, Brother Stewart's method would, in the opinion of the editor, answer all practical purposes, and in addition to these answers, I would say that so long as wire is not heated appreciably the passage of electric current over it has no effect of any kind whatsoever; it could be used indefinitely without any change whatever in its carrying capacity, except, as before said, that it be loaded to a point where the temperature rises appreciably, but I think that, in order to injure the carrying capacity of a wire to any extent, the heat must be sufficient to be distinctly discernable to the touch. I am not sure, but I do not think, for instance, blood heat would affect the copper at all, at least unless it were maintained steadily for a very, very long time. Ed.]

Light Trouble.

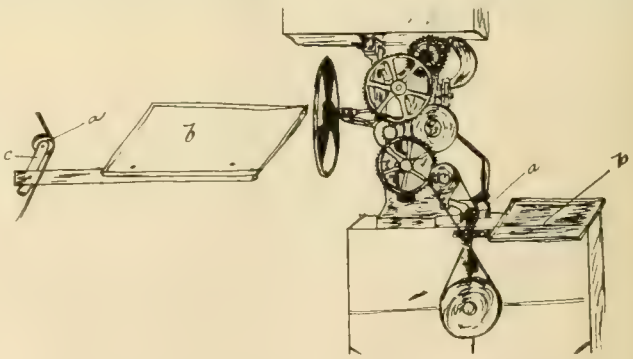
K. L. Seifert, Kahoka, Missouri, has seen a ghost. He says:

> There seems to be a dark spot in the center of my picture. It shows rather blue and black when there is something white in the center of the picture. Kindly tell me what I can do to get rid of this pest. In closing, let me thank you and the WORLD for the help I have received through its columns.

The difficulty most likely lies in your condenser lenses. I would suggest that you forward $2.50 for a copy of the Handbook, and study up a little on the matter of lenses. I cannot tell you what is wrong, because you have not given me any data. Tell me the width of your picture, and the exact length of the throw, and then I can perhaps do something for you. Meanwhile, try spacing your condenser different distances apart, and move the lamp house backwards and forwards with relation to the machine head. I would suggest that you examine the table on page 430, July 18th issue, and fit up your lenses in accord therewith, and that you study carbon setting in the Handbook, since the set of your carbons and angle of the lamp may possibly have something to do with it.

A Belt Tightener.

J. W. Razor, Rushville, Indiana, has broken into the inventor's union with the following, which he calls a "regular film saver," and which he says is very easily and cheaply made. It is designed for attachment to Powers' 6A machines. As I understand Brother Razor's description of the device it operates as follows:



The small metal table of the Powers Six A is held in place by four screws. He moves this table over so that only two of the screws hold it to the casting, and the other two to extend, as shown. To these two idle screws he attaches a small piece of wood, as shown in the separate drawing, and to the end of this piece he attaches another short piece, C carrying the small grooved idler pulley A. The whole thing is, in effect, a belt tightener, the idea being that the tension of the take-up belt can be altered by moving pulley A with the hand, which makes it possible to have very light tension at the beginning, when the pull on the film is the heaviest, and, afterwards, as the film roll diameter increases the operator can tighten the belt slightly, and thus increase the take-up tension.

Undoubtedly an intelligent use of such a device would tend to reduce the strain on the sprocket holes of the film. Brother Razor wants to know if it would be of any value to the manufacturer, meaning, I presume, would a manufacturer buy such an idea. No, I do not think so. In fact, while the idea is clever enough in its way, still it would be utterly useless to present it to machine manufacturers. Sorry, Brother Razor, but if you don't think that is right try it out for yourself and see.

From Panama.

C. F. Young, Balboa Heights, Canal Zone, favors us with the following:

> I noticed, in a recent issue, an item by a West Virginia exhibitor regarding damaged film. He said the picture on the screen was all right. If my theory is correct, this might well be, since I think the damage was done by the lower or take-up sprocket. General Instruction No. 14, page 18 of the Handbook, gives instructions with regard to lining the lower magazine. In West Virginia's case the lower magazine was, I think, out of line, which caused the film to pull over just a little, or if the punctures were between the bars then the take-up tension was too great, the teeth running on the film instead of in the holes. Am sending a piece of damaged film illustrative of my idea. Have had the same trouble several times myself. In the Philippines I ran a show, using an old style motiograph, and I certainly had troubles of my own with the film running off the lower sprocket.

No, I do not think your theory is correct, Brother Young. The film you sent is not damaged at all the same as was that of West Virginia. The peculiarity of the West Virginia film was that throughout the whole length of the two feet he sent there was a minute puncture, or impression, right square in the middle of the bar between each sprocket hole on one side only. Brother Young also pointed out a few minor errors in the Handbook which have already, however, been discovered. His finding these errors, mostly typographical, shows that he has studied the book closely, and that it as it should be.

Carbon Economizer.

C. H. Talley, 757 W. Onondaga Street, Syracuse, New York, has forwarded to the department samples of his carbon economizer. These economizers consist of a piece of tubing of copper composition some 2 inches in length, over one end of which is forced a larger piece of tubing of similar material, the upper end of which is split. The lower piece of tubing is designed to be clamped in the carbon clamp of the arc lamp just as a carbon would be, and the upper piece forms a socket for carbon butts. The upper end of the large pipe is slotted by a saw kerf and around it is a band with a set screw, so that the carbon butt is rigidly clamped and cannot but make good electrical contact.

I have examined these economizers closely and can say they appear to be thoroughly practicable. They should allow of the consumption of carbon butts down to very nearly within one inch of their entire length. The device is nickel plated, neatly gotten up, and is substantial throughout. If the set screw be kept lubricated with graphite, and if ordinary care be observed in clamping the carbon it seems to me it ought to last indefinitely. To sum the whole matter up the device is a good one, and one which I recommend to operators and managers.

Editor an Acrobat.

Let us for a moment depart from the subject of projection and describe an interesting experience. All summer the editor has been intending to go to Atlantic City. Once he wrote he was coming, but something occurred which prevented the trip. Writing of this, later, Brother Reed of Atlantic City said: "It was cruel. The news got all over town and most of the boys stayed up all night polishing up their operating rooms."

Well, Saturday, October 10th, with Mrs. Richardson on the tandem, I pointed the go-devil towards Atlantic City, and turned her loose in the speed-limit notch, but in passing through Freehold, about forty miles out, a jinx somehow managed to jump aboard and perch himself on the handle bars, all unseen to the editorial chauffeur, and that darned jinx certainly got in his work, and got it in good and plenty, too. Before we got out of Freehold the rear tire went down, and in the next twenty miles it went down five times. Moreover, we got on the wrong road and went six miles out of our way in the sand. But at last the rear tube concluded to behave and our troubles seemed at an end, but I had told the boys in Atlantic City that we would arrive about 2:30. We had lost three hours, were very late, and skimming along at thirty-seven miles an hour (don't tell the speed cop) when bing, and likewise bang! the front shoe let go. We piled up in a heap, after sweeping up two or three rods of the roadway and accumulating something less than half the sand and gravel in New Jersey; it was some heap let me inform you. Two automobiles behind us stopped, and were more than kind, taking Mrs. Richardson on, to the doctor in Tuckerton, where she will remain for two weeks. Nothing serious, but a very painful wound. The editor was "skun" up quite some, but still able to navigate.

After getting Mrs. Richardson fixed as comfortably as possible, and having a new shoe put on the front wheel, the editor, next morning, started on for Atlantic City, thirty-one miles away, but that garage man (may he and his household be forever blinkety-blanked even unto the fourth generation) had put on a shoe that was too large for the rim, and six miles from Tuckerton, when I was just hitting the high places at forty-two miles an hour, again bing, likewise bang! and the whole tire came off the front rim. Again the editor did a pin-wheel, ploughed up enough ground to plant a respectable field of turnips, saw more stars than the Almighty ever put in the heavens, arose and picked up the wreck. It took two mortal hours to straighten out that mess, the air valve of the tube having been torn out bodily, but the deed was finally did and again the editor straddled the gasoline bronco, only to have the front tire go flat within two miles. He stopped, said a short but very emphatic prayer, and would have torn his beard had he been the possessor of such an animal. But there was nothing else to do but fix it, and that is what he did, arriving at Atlantic City finally, just after the meeting of the union which he was to attend was over, and the time near when all the men had to go to work.

The editor was too badly banged up to visit many theaters. The boys were very kind, but the editor walked like a saw-buck, and when he moved it felt like the joints were rusty, so beyond visiting two or three convenient houses and the Million Dollar Pier, nothing was accomplished.

William Reed, known to his friends as "Billy," and to old timers as "Vitagraph Bill," resides in Atlantic City, and is chief operator at the Colonial theater on Atlantic avenue. Billy is, beyond question, the oldest moving picture operator in the United States who is still working at the business. There is one other as old, but he is no longer operating, nor has he for some time past, so William Reed is daddy of the whole works. No, the above is not a likeness of President Wilson.

It is a picture of the editor and Brother Reed, taken just before we departed the next morning, also you will observe the trusty go-devil we have been speaking about is very much in evidence. Brother Reed rode with us on the return trip as far as Pleasantville, returning home by trolley.

Brother R. W. Titus works with Billy at the Colonial and they certainly have a nice operating room, equipped with two Power's Six A machines, taking current through a Westinghouse mercury arc rectifier. The only criticism I could make is that the boys have too much light in their room, and, as I told them, it is impossible to deliver the best results under such a condition. Aside from this the Colonial offered nothing to criticise.

During the afternoon the editor visited Young's Million Dollar Pier to look at the plant he had heard so much about. He found F. Carlin operating a time-worn motiograph, projecting a picture about 16 feet wide at 215 feet, using a 12-inch e.f. Gundlach half-size lens, with a 6½ condensing lens next to the arc and a 7½ in front.

All this, it seems to me, is quite remarkable. Brother Carlin was getting very good results, the projection surface being a mirror screen. The spot was round and fairly white, though by no means brilliant.

I would like to have James, Griffiths, LaGrow, or for that matter, any other operator who feels inclined to do so, comment on this lens system. I am informed that long focal length condensers have been tried, but they did not work in practice.

In the evening I went over and had a talk with manager O'Keefe, of the City Square Theatre, who is having trouble with the union. It is barely possible that as a result of our conversation the difficulty may be settled. It seems to me that the whole trouble might have been avoided in the first place. The union, then a newly formed body, selected a committee to wait on manager O'Keefe, which had more energy than diplomacy. My reason for mentioning this fact is to warn other unions. It is mighty easy to stir up trouble, and sometimes you can kick up more disturbance in five minutes than can be settled in a year, and do it, too, just by going about things in the wrong way. There are a great many different ways of saying any one particular thing. I can make a demand on you in point-blank fashion, and in tone and manner which will cause you to invite me to close the front door from the outside, and do it real quick! I can make the same demand in other words and other manner and you will say: Why certainly, old man! Glad to do it! And you would not even dream of getting angry. Do you see what I am getting at? The whole trouble in the City Square Theater matter seems to have arisen in the point-blank way the committee put things. It called there with a chip on its shoulder. Had it gone with the chip concealed in a coat pocket and made the same demand in a diplomatic manner, I doubt if there would have been any trouble at all.

I am using this incident to try and get other new unions to realize the fact that when a committee of this kind goes out, it should be very carefully selected; pick out your very best men—men who are cool, level-headed, and who know how to put things diplomatically, though on the other hand don't select men who have a wish-bone instead of a back-bone. There is an extreme both ways.

In passing I dropped into the Star theater in Atlantic avenue, near New York avenue, and passed the compliments of the season with the manager. The Star is run by Swank & Hollsworth. I also dropped in at the Cozy for a moment, but unfortunately have forgotten the manager's name.

The jinx evidently liked Atlantic City, for he remained there, and Mr. Go-devil was strictly on his good behavior all the way back to New York, for which praise be, because just one more fall of that kind and the editor would have been completely skinned, all ready to fry. He now feels that he is eligible to active membership in the acrobat's union, if there is any such thing.

Triplett Loop Setter.

J. M. Triplett, Wenatchee, Washington, is the inventor of the loop setter recently described in the department and illustrated in the accompanying picture. Brother Triplett now has the loop setter on the market and it may be installed on all motors of Powers, Edison and Motiograph machines the installation requiring but fifteen minutes.

The device is simple, positive in its action, and I see no reason why it should not give satisfaction. Moreover, the manufacturer guarantees every setter to work to the satisfaction of the purchaser. Descriptive matter may be obtained by addressing J. M. Triplett, No. 6 North Columbia street, Wenatchee, Wis. See his advertisement elsewhere.

Fresno Boys Get Charter.

Fresno, California, operators, who formerly were part of Local No. 158, I. A. T. S. E., have now beeen granted a charter of their own. Success to you, gentlemen, and may your new local live long and prosper.

Back from England.

John Griffiths, who has been visiting in Merrie (though not so merry right now), England, is back on the job at the Pastime Theatre, Ansonia, Connecticut, and writes as follows:

> Here I am back on the job. Was much interested in Michigan's remarks regarding the meniscus-bi-convex lenses, page 1640, issue September 19th. My own view, at present, is that they are very good, although I have not as yet had experience with them. The tables I recently sent have no bearing on the meniscus system of condensers, and it should be borne in mind that the meniscus-bi-convex combination projects a very much shorter cone of light than the plano-convex condenser, therefore I imagine that the meniscus-bi-convex lenses available at present are best suited to wide angle objectives. I note you seem surprised that Michigan can project a good picture at 130 feet with a 6½ and a 7½ combination of condensers. Now let us consider that matter: He is projecting an 18-foot picture with a standard aperture of .906 of an inch, therefore his objective is approximately 6½ e. f. If he is working with a distance of 16¼ inches between center of condensers and aperture he can obtain excellent results with his arc 3½ inches from the center of the condensers, but I am afraid he would lose a few condensing lenses. If he is working with a shorter cone and his lamp house nearer the machine head he is not obtaining the best results possible. The above refers only to the piano convex lenses. I fully expected the tables on condensers which I sent in some time ago would have been pulled to pieces before now, because if they were partly in error it would be so easy to prove it by actual test. As regards Friend Goggin's remarks about the e. f. of the objective, why he can prove whether he is right or wrong by carefully measuring his throw, the width of his picture and the width of his aperture with a Vernier rule, and using the old formulas for finding the e. f. when the throw and the width of picture and aperture are known. With the result thus obtained measure from the aperture to a point where the film would be in focus to the edge of the lens barrel, adding the difference after the lens was taken out of the machine, and this would give the exact point of e. f. of that particular lens. I think it will vary from the center of the lense barrel, according to the difference between the front and back lenses.

Will Michigan kindly try out Friend Griffiths' suggestion and report results. I have not had any adverse criticism on the table above referred to. This may be due to the fact that it is correct, or it may be partly due to the fact that it has not yet been fully tested out by operators. You know, Brother Griffiths, and I know, that the great mass of men are adverse to making experiments, even where so important a thing as this is involved; particularly when they would have to ask their manager to take a chance and buy different lenses from those they have. I am afraid I will have to go to the expense of rigging up a projection outfit over at my own home, in order to make practical tests of these various things which are sent in. I do not like to do this, partly on account of the expense involved and partly on account of the extra work it will entail. I have quite enough to do right now, but if it has to be done it will be done, and that is all there is to it. The method of proving the correctness of Brother Griffiths' theory is correct on the face of it, but while it is quite possible that the point of e. f. would vary slightly, I do not think it would vary enough to be of any considerable importance. In practical work the point of e. f. is, of course, not the center of the lens barrel, but the point central between the two lenses, one or both of which may set back in the barrel quite a distance.

He Wants it Bad.

Waldo Nelson, operator, Rex Theatre, Ogden, Utah, encloses an order for $2.50 and says:

> For heaven's sake hurry up, make use of the enclosed $2.50 and send me the Handbook. I find that the longer I operate the less I know, and every bit of knowledge I have has been acquired by traveling the hard and bumpy road of experience. After examining one of your Handbooks I found it to be exactly what I have been looking for. Also please advise me where I can purchase Hawkins Electrical Guide, which you recommend.

The Handbook has gone forward, and the Hawkins Electrical Guide may be had by forwarding $6.00 to the editor, accompanied by a stamped envelope, with which to forward it to the publishers, or if you prefer to pay for the books by the week, then forward $1.00 and agree to pay $1.00 a week for six weeks.

Book on Photography.

Edgar S. O'Neill, Sioux City, Iowa, writes:

> Can you tell me where I can obtain a good book on motion photography and the taking of motion pictures?

No, Brother O'Neill, I cannot. Recently a friend of mine in California wanted that kind of a book, and I only succeeded in getting one by purchasing the same from a friend over at the Vitagraph plant. It was a large book, cost $4.00, and as I understand it, is out of print. I did not, as I should have done, keep its name or the name of its publisher. If any one knows of such a work I would like to have the name and the name of the author.

Wants the Doctor.

Wells Bros., Amusement Company, Toronto, Canada, has troublous trouble, which they set forth as follows:

> I am "stuck" and, you being the moving picture doctor, here I am ringing your bell. Up to the present time I have been using rheostats with my road outfit. I recently saw a set of choke coils which could be used with excellent results on 110 or 220-volt circuits and which would work equally well on 25 or 60-cycle current. The set consisted of three small choke coils wound on square laminated plates about 5 x 7 inches, the same being bolted through at the four corners, and only weighing about ten or twelve pounds each. They could be connected in series or multiple, to obtain any desired result, and had the advantage of running practically cold. I could not get any statistics from the owner as to material and proportions used, though he hinted that he got the recipe through The World. Can you give me any data on this? I enclose, 4 cents in stamps, as suggested, and would be glad to receive any information you can give me as regards this or any manufactured device which, without being too expensive, would meet the above requirements. Lightness of weight being an important factor.

I don't think, gentlemen, that the party got the "recipe" through the projection department; at least I do not remember publishing anything of that sort. I cannot give you any data concerning this device, nor do I know where you could procure such a choke coil. The only thing I could suggest would be for you to do your own experimenting, or else write to J. H. Hallberg, 36 East 23rd Street, New York City; tell him exactly what you want, and ask his prices on the same. You could, of course, have a tinner cut you up black sheet iron, such as stove pipes are made of, of the size and shape of the core of the instrument you saw, with a hole in each corner of each plate, to bolt the whole thing together. You could then paint these pieces of sheet iron with an insulating compound; bolt them together, and wind a coil of No. 6 or No. 8 wire around them, but I could not even begin to tell you how many turns it would take, nor could I give you a recipe for the insulating compound, nor could I guarantee the results to be satisfactory. I think on the whole that Brother Hallberg would be your best bet.

I would also like to say to you Canadian operators that, while Canadian stamps are a most excellent article in Canada, I have got a nice little collection of them here already that I don't know what to do with. I have altogether forty-two two's and thirty-two one's, and really I do not think I need any more. Of course they were sent in good faith, but, as a matter of fact, United States stamps are not good in Canada, and Canadian stamps are not good in the United States—and there you are.

Interesting Letter.

Crocket Brown, Nashwauk, Minnesota, has had Uncle Sam bring the following to New York:

> While I have always had excellent projection, with clear, steady light, using 25 amperes from my Brush plant, still, I have always had a small dark circle in center of the screen, regardless of what combination of condensers I used. After reading your comment on the meniscus-bi-convex combination, August 1st issue, I at once sent to J. D. Elbert for special condenser mount, and at the same time ordered from the Laemmle Film Service, a pair of the meniscus-bi-convex lenses. The condensers and the mount arrived at about the same time. I followed your suggestion and put a very thin ring, or washer, of asbestos in the mount so that the lens did not come in contact with the metal, and tried them out. The result was simply great. There was not a sign of that beastly little spot; the screen was clear and even all over, but—in using the new lenses I was obliged to bring the lamp house nearer the machine; also to run the arc close to the condensers, and I broke the meniscus the third night, due, I think, to heating too rapidly before the condensers had a chance to become seasoned. This I think I can in future avoid by running the arc back and heating the lenses up slowly for a few nights until they become accustomed to this Minnesota atmosphere.

And now, another thing: I most emphatically disagree with G. D. Bullock's reply to question 43, in which he advises a belt driven plant in preference to the direct connected, giving as his reason that the average gas engine used in these small plants is four cycle, and therefore has but one power stroke in four, which requires large fly wheels to gain momentum necessary to drive the unit at constant speed, and that either a pit would be necessary for the engine, or a pier for the generator. Now, I wonder what kind of plant Mr. Bullock has in mind. He listens like a man who knows what he is talking about, but he certainly is wrong on this plant dope. I have been using a Brush direct connected plant for two years. It requires a space only 21 x 31 inches, and does not have those large fly wheels which Brother Bullock declares to be necessary. It has only one small fly, or balance wheel, located between the engine and generator, the same being approximately 18 inches in diameter. The momentum matter is taken care of in the crank case by a patented balancing device, the invention of Allison P. Brush. Mr. Bullock also offers as objection that a direct driven set would require either a high speed engine or a slow speed generator, either of which, he says, is more expensive than those in common use. Of course, if the exhibitor is looking for something cheap, regardless of quality, this is quite correct, but I have to again disagree with him because most direct connected plants are built for 750 revolutions per minute. That is what mine runs, and while 750 might be considered slow for a generator, it is by no means high for a gas engine. I'll bet your "Harley D" will do twice that and do it easily. There is an automobile in this town with an engine capable of making 3,200 revolutions per minute. It is quite true that these high-grade, direct driven outfit cost more money, but they are well worth the additional price. My advice to any exhibitor installing a direct driven plant is to place it on a good, solid, concrete foundation, with a thickness of 1 inch soft pine between the base of the plant and the concrete. As for the muffler described by Mr. Bullock, it is no doubt O. K. if any one cares to go to that trouble, but for me, I just run the exhaust out through the roof and put the muffler on the outside of the building. A well-built muffler produces very little, if any, back pressure, and as for noise, there is none. Now I trust you won't think I am saying this just for the sake of starting an argument, but when you consider the thousands of exhibitors who read the department and that many of them are figuring on putting in their own plant I think you will see the benefit of a fair discussion of this mattter and Friend Bullock's answer might lead them to decide that a belt driven plant is better than a direct connected. I use my plant summer and winter, and 50 degrees below is no uncommon thing in this particular neck of the woods. For the past five years I have been running the only theatre Nashwauk has, and if I ever have opposition I only hope he is a fellow who does not read The Moving Picture World, as he would be easy to beat. For my service I use general features, and anything else that I think is good. My motto has always been: "Good is not good enough; the best is none too good for the patrons of the Unique Theatre." In closing I send best wishes for yourself and all connected with The Moving Picture World.

I have been much interested in reading Brother Brown's letter. He is manager of the Unique Theatre in his little city, and judging by his letter, a live wire. As to the meniscus-bi-convex combination, one of the largest and highest-class optical dealers in the middle west, a firm for which I have an abiding admiration, disagrees with me as to the benefit to be derived by the use of meniscus-bi-convex condensers. However, they base this entirely on the fact that, while they admit that theoretically there ought to be a difference in the light, tests they have made have failed to disclose it. Now my recommendation of this combination was not based altogether on improvement in the light. In fact that was the lesser part of the matter. I had believed, and notwithstanding the opinion of the firm in question, I still believe that there is not only some improvement in the light, but there is or ought to be a very great lessening of spherical aberration, and, therefore a sharpening of the definition of the picture.

I know that this might be disputed by some, who would claim that spherical aberration in the condenser would not affect the sharpness of the picture, since that fault would be corrected by the objective lenses, but I doubt if that is altogether true, and in any event, it certainly would put an increased strain on the optical powers of the objective. As I said, I have every respect for the opinion of the firm in question, but in this case I would have to know that they had made very careful experiments, not only as to improvement of the light, but the improvement to the definition of the picture as well. I think your trouble lies, to some extent, at least, in the fact that you have not been furnished with quite the right combination of lenses, I believe that one or more of your meniscus lenses is of too short focal length, but, after all, that is only a guess. It is very difficult to secure accurate data on a proposition of this kind, where a new lens combination is just coming into use.

As to the electric plant, I think I will keep my fingers out of that particular mess of porridge at this time, because maybe it has not cooled off enough, and I might get them burned. There is no objection to reasonably high speed in a gas engine, in fact it is desirable, but in a steam engine there is every objection. However, you are wrong in one point. Brother Bullock did not mean cheap at the expense of quality. The point he intended to make was, I think, that a low speed engine of the same mechanical excellence can be built more cheaply than a high speed engine, whereas, on the other hand, a moderately high speed generator of the same excellence can be built cheaper than a low speed generator of the same grade, and there you are.

The editor of this department is placed in rather a difficult position in these matters. He is expected to answer a more or less difficult optical problem propounded by an operator in California; pick up another letter and tell a would-be operator what he has got to do to secure a license in Minnesota; pick up another letter and tell a man how to build a transformer, or which make is best; the next communication may be from China, asking information about mercury arc rectifiers. The next gentleman might write from the backwoods of Maine and want to know why in the blinkety blink ——— company didn't take the jump out of their films, followed by a letter from Arizona asking what is the most desirable pitch to give an auditorium floor, or how much keystone effect there would be with the lenses 14 feet above the center of the screen, or what size picture is best with a certain auditorium, or, Oh, Lord, what's the use! You ought to watch the mail as it comes and goes for just one week, and you would realize then some of the difficulties of the position of editor of the projection department of this distinguished publication. However, I guess you will admit that you don't get the old man "stuck" very often, though I will admit that I often have to do some acrobatic stunts to keep just a few jumps in advance of you.

Light Trouble.

Robert J. Richardson, Jr., Clifton Heights, Delaware, writes:

> Have been having trouble with a ghost in the center of the screen; sometimes it is very blue and sometimes the discoloration is but slight. We are using 40 amperes through a 220-volt Fort Wayne compensarc, with a 7½ condenser at the rear and a 6½ in front, the front lens being 18 inches from the objective; the throw is 45 feet, and the carbons ⅝ cored. Equipment Lubin lamp house and machine. Wires at the arc lugs are cleaned every week, and the lugs themselves are renewed about once a month.

You have omitted one very essential piece of information, viz.: the width of your picture. However, your lens combination is not right. If you are only 45 feet from the screen and are projecting a 12-foot picture you have about a 3½ objective, and if the picture is wider than 12 feet you have a still shorter lens. I think very likely a part of your trouble is due to wrong carbon set. I would advise you by all means to get a Handbook, and study carbon setting. I would also advise you to use a smaller carbon below, preferably a 7/16 cored, though you might try a ½ inch. I would also suggest that you probably need two 6½ condensers, and that your lamp house needs to be moved nearer the objective, at least I would try that, but I cannot say more without knowing the focal length of your objective.

New Orleans Trouble.

From New Orleans, Louisiana, comes a front page of a paper which bears the title: "L'Abeille de la Nouvelle-Orleans," to which is pinned a typewritten sheet of paper addressed to "Monseiur" Richardson. The aforesaid typewritten sheet contains also a pasted-on clipping, in which it appears that: "Milton Covington and Emile Prudhomme started on a tour of moving picture houses Saturday night throwing 'stink bombs.' They emptied two houses of their Saturday night human swarm when they ran afoul of Detective McCabe at Rampart and Canal Streets at 10 o'clock, who took them to the police station, where charges of disturbing the peace were filed. The two declared that they had been employed to throw the bombs in the theaters by an ex-moving picture operator, who, according to their story, gave Covington two dollars, and he, Covington, divided, fifty-fifty, with Prudhomme, whom he took in as a partner. The police, crediting their story, are looking for the employer."

Now this is an exceedingly likely yarn, is it not? The presumption intended to be raised in the mind of the public is, of course, that the striking New Orleans operators were behind the matter, and going a little further the members of Local 293. The correspondent says, in the course of his remarks: "Would very much like to write you concerning local conditions, but I will, however, leave that to you should you ever have an opportunity to visit our city."

Well, I am not so very familiar with conditions in New Orleans, and while I have been pretty thoroughly all over that beautiful metropolis in days gone by, and while I had perhaps more real enjoyment in the ten days spent in that city than in any equal amount of time spent elsewhere, still that does not help me any regarding conditions there now, nor do I expect to be able to visit the City by the Gulf for a long, long time, if ever.

I may safely say, however, that New Orleans theater managers are simply standing in their own light in opposing the efforts of New Orleans' operators to secure better conditions. The record of the past everywhere shows that increased wages and bettered conditions have invariably been followed by a corresponding increase in efficiency, and that this increase in efficiency has more than balanced the cost of the improvement. Now let me try to impress upon New Orleans', and incidentally, other managers, that it would be childish to dispute this proposition, because it is written on the pages of history, not in merely one instance, but in thousands of instances, yes, in tens of thousands of instances, and in-so-far as my knowledge goes, and I think I am pretty well posted, there has not been a single exception to this rule.

Now, please don't understand, gentlemen, that I mean by this that an increase in salary, or the betterment of working conditions, would be immediately followed by corresponding increase in efficiency. To make a claim of that kind would be idiotic, but the improvement in efficiency will come, and it will come just as surely as day follows the night. Any process that is sure is almost invariably somewhat slow. I would like, also, to again point out the absolutely undeniable fact that in every single instance, wherever men have been organized into unions for a length of time sufficient to allow the organization to improve the working conditions, and the salaries of its members, the moral, of the membership, its working efficiency, its habits and its value to the employer has not only been raised to a higher plane, but it has been raised to a very much higher plane

I, myself, am 48 years old, and I can remember the time when the house painter, for instance, was, with but comparatively few exceptions, a heavy drinker, and almost a bum. He received from a dollar twenty-five to two twenty-five for ten hour's work; two hours on a job without a can of beer would mean that there was not a saloon within a mile. Today the painter is thoroughly organized. He gets from three fifty to five dollars for eight hours' work. He has become a self-respecting mechanic and a good citizen, and I do not believe you could find a big painting contractor anywhere who would be willing to go back to the old $1.25- $2.25-ten-hour regime.

The same thing will hold true with the New Orleans theater managers; the painter bosses put up a terrific fight against the painters' organization. The railroad magnates put up an awful scrap against the Brotherhoods, but they accepted the inevitable; and have been the gainers. And so it was with the carpenters, the bricklayers, plumbers and the rest. New Orleans theater managers are now undergoing the process that these other employers underwent. They are fighting the organization of labor. They might just exactly as well fight the waves of the Atlantic Ocean; they would accomplish, in the long run, precisely as much. They are wasting energy which might better be employed in improving their projection. They are, in the judgment of the editor, taking an extremely unwise course, and, as I said in the beginning, are simply standing in their own light and impeding the progress of the photoplay in New Orleans.

As to the stink bomb matter, the editor does not believe the union had anything to do with it, but, even allowing they had, while this department cannot and most emphatically does not countenance any such tactics, still, in common fairness, it might be said that a strike is nothing in the world but an industrial war, and in time of war we cannot too harshly condemn men for utilizing such weapons as they have at hand. But, regardless of that view of the matter, I would say that the use of methods of this kind is foolish, for it very seldom, if ever, wins anything. It merely embitters the contest, and makes the managers more determined than ever to crush the organization, if they can. Therefore, laying aside the right or wrong of the use of such methods, the thing is unwise, and the very poorest kind of poor policy.

I wish both the New Orleans managers and operators to understand that this is written in the kindest spirit, and by one who has kept close watch on the labor movement for almost thirty years. The wise thing for the New Orleans managers to do would be to meet the organization in a friendly spirit and say: "Here, boys, let us talk this matter over like reasonable men, and try to arrive at a conclusion which will be fair to both sides"; having in mind the fact, however, that high-class work always commands good pay.

The Probable Cause.

Canada writes as follows:

> Page 60, October 3rd issue, you tell W. Crowther, Fall River, Mass., that the probable seat of his trouble is a worn sprocket. It struck me that perhaps the sprocket was over to one side too much, and rubbing on the intermittent sprocket idler. I have been told that this will wear to a sharp edge that will cut a strip off the edge of the film as it passes through the machine.

To all of which Brother Crowther will please take notice. Possibly this is the answer to his difficulty. Frankly, I don't know.

Wow!

A Tennessee exhibitor writes to a film exchange as follows:

> Gentlemen: I wish to call your attention to the fact that the Canfield Gas Engine Company, of Binghamton, N. Y., are making a first class film cleaner at a price that allows even a junk exchange to purchase one. The Edison people also make cement at $7 per gallon, and said cement works a whole lot better than tobacco juice for cementing films. Likewise, one way to hold customers is as follows: Inspection Department! Think it over.

All of which will undoubtedly hold the exchange manager for quite a spell. However in fairness to the exchange it might be noted that the exhibitor in question is paying less than one dollar per reel, and expects the exchange to include "The Adventures of Kathlyn," the series of "Dolly of the Dailies," "The Man Who Disappeared," and the "Octavius" series, without extra charge. The exchange then writes: "We do not ask your opinion of this: we know it already. As for what he terms 'tobacco juice' we would respectfully say that we are using the best grade of cement on the market, and have inspectors who very thoroughly know their business."

It must be admitted, and will be admitted by those who know, that very many of the exchanges could make vast improvement in their inspection departments, and make it with profit to all concerned too. But here is an exhibitor who is, if the statement of the exchange be true, totally and absolutely unreasonable. He is paying an absurdly low price, yet he demands the most popular series pictures there are, and, moreover, expects his film to be in good condition. I have often roasted exchange men for the poor inspection given films, however an exhibitor is not entitled to expect much of anything except junk when he pays junk prices. There are too many exchanges which send out film without proper inspection, also there are too many exhibitors who want something for nothing, and that is a mighty hard thing to get in this vale of sorrow and tears.

Uses Ninety Amperes.

Leonn W. Gregg, Westbrook, Connecticut, writes:

> Am owner, manager and operator in a small town, giving one show a week, which provides me with a little spare change. Am not an expert in any department, therefore appeal to you for assistance. Am using 110-volt, 25-cycle current, through an Edison 25-cycle transformer. The projector is a Powers Six A, with loop setter, which latter is worth its weight in gold. I use ¾ carbons. As I continually visit Boston and New York picture houses, to both of which cities my business calls me, I feel safe in saying that, by comparison, we have A No. 1 results on the screen, projecting a 14-foot picture at 68 feet. We are on a separate wire, with a 5 k. w. transformer on an outside pole. Recently I put in an ammeter because I was blowing 40 ampere fuses, and was surprised to find a continual reading of 85 to 97 amperes; changed to 50 and 60 ampere fuses and they seem to hold. This ammeter reading is had when using transformer lever is at five turns to raise amperage. Have roughly gone over wiring from carbons to outside switch, and can find no apparent trouble. What is the most likely seat of the difficulty?

Holy smoke, old man, you certainly ought to be getting good results with 90 amperes. That is about equal to 45 amperes d. c., and it is what a. c. users ought to pump into their arc, particularly when using such low cycle current. But it's expensive for a small-town show. The only answer I can see to this state of affairs is that the pole transformer is delivering a much higher voltage than it is supposed to, or else you have got your connections made wrong somewhere. (See page 153 of the Handbook). You should have your leads from the pole transformer connected to the two outside binding posts on the line side, but even if you had it connected to the middle and the "common" it ought not to make nearly that much difference, unless the supply voltage is high. In any event, however, you are certainly overloading that economizer good and plenty. I would suggest that you have the power company test the voltage of the secondary of the pole transformer.

Waste of Energy.

Seattle, Washington, writes:

> I am a foreigner, and my opponent in this argument is from Missouri. (Some combination. Ed.) Now I call the Power's Six, or Six A movement a "geneva movement." My friend from Missouri says I am wrong, since the Power's has no pin-wheel, no star, or geneva. It certainly is not a beater or dog movement, nor is it a claw movement. What is it? Also I call the Power's Five a star movement, and Mr. Missouri again says I am wrong.

Well, my brother, answering questions of this kind is rather a waste of energy. Custom rules very largely in language, as in other matters, and while I presume "maltese cross movement" would be more nearly correct, still the custom is to describe the Power's Six movement as a geneva movement, and it is hailed by that title in the Power's factory. The Power's Five movement is properly described as either a "star and cam movement," or a "geneva movement." It is not so important that we be strictly correct in word, as it is to convey the idea, and certainly if you spoke of a Power's Five or Six "geneva movement" anyone a all acquainted with projection machines would understand. It is no uncommon thing for the real meaning of a word or a phrase to change materially with the passing years, and while originally the term "geneva movement" applied only to one certain type of intermittent mechanism, it may now be applied to several.

Stretched Film.

Tacoma, Washington, recently sent in samples of a Kalem film which were stretched. The matter was referred to the Kalem Company, and a portion of their letter of reply reads as follows:

> The film in question was issued in August. The perforations are uniformly spaced. Since the time of issue, shrinkage has taken place to the extent of .12 inch in linear foot. Shrinkage in width is found to be .02 of an inch, or equivalent to .2 inch in a lateral foot. We only found the one fault in the film, viz.: that of shrinkage, and that is quite sufficient to cause the trouble referred to by Mr. Cleveland. During the past few months we have had complaints of a similar nature, and upon investigation found that the film had stretched after being in use a few months. We are taking this matter up with the Eastman Kodak Company. We have observed from specimens of film which we did not use, but retained in the factory, that while one lot would shrink, another would stretch. We would be pleased to learn if other film producers have met with the same difficulty.

I have not had complaints of this nature from other makes of film, but it is quite possible, however, that other producers have met with the same trouble, and I would respectfully suggest that if this is the case it would be up to the film stock makers to get busy, locate and remedy so serious a fault. There is, of course, no apparent reason why the trouble should be confined to the Kalem, and I am writing several other producers relative to this matter.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SEALED ART GALLERY (Edison), Oct. 27.—The twelfth mystery in the "Chronicles of Cleek" series, by Thomas W. Hanshew, featuring Ben F. Wilson, supported by Gertrude McCoy and the usual strong cast. While this offering is unusually well acted and splendidly photographed and mounted there is a noticeable weakness in the plot, that seems to indicate a tendency to derogation, which finally eventuates in a continuation of series; however, it is entertaining.

THE UNPLANNED ELOPEMENT (Essanay), Oct. 27.—A picture-play meritorious, because the plot and action are out of the beaten track. The author, H. Tipton Steck, and E. H. Calvert, the director, have involved a star cast made up of Francis X. Bushman, Ruth Stonehouse, E. H. Calvert and supporting artists, in a plot that contains many thrilling, well photographed scenes. Conjecture as to the outcome and intensity in the last scenes make this a very interesting offering.

THE NO-ACCOUNT COUNT (Kalem), Oct. 27.—A farce comedy featuring John E. Brennan as Weary Bill, a tramp; Fred Hornby, as Count De Bluffe; John Rand, as Hardup, and Ethel Teare, as Melinda, an awful fright. Albert W. Hale, the producer, has made of this one of the best laugh producers which has been offered recently, and all of the artists in the cast have done full justice in their various renditions of their parts.

LOVE AND TITLE (Lubin), Oct. 27.—Will Lewis is the writer and producer of this farcical offering. There are several funny situations of a rough order, with the usual jump in the lake. It has a satisfactory ending. On the same reel with "She Married for Love."

SHE MARRIED FOR LOVE (Lubin), Oct. 27.—On the same reel with "Love and Title." A very taking comedy by Epes Winthrop Sargent, that involves a couple of families in numerous cut-a-caper acts with a circus acrobat. Much might be said in favor of this offering; it is really worth the viewing. Eva Bell and Raymond McKee deserve mention.

WHY THE SHERIFF IS A BACHELOR (Selig), Oct. 27.—A western drama by Tom Mix, featuring Tom Mix as the sheriff. It is filled with the usual riding and shooting, etc., embracing a theme of love, which gives a certain amount of interest. The concluding scenes develop a surprise, that is probably antagonistic to the average spectator's supposition of the final termination. The sheriff is loyal to his duty, regardless of personal feelings. It is gripping and interesting throughout.

THE FABLE OF THE PEOPLE'S CHOICE WHO ANSWERED THE CALL OF DUTY AND TOOK SELTZER (Essanay), Oct. 28.—A good illustration of the game of politics, which will "make good" as a truthful depiction of the doings which take place during election times in corporations, sizing up from the smallest to the largest in population. There is always a ring existing—small or large. George Ade furnishes the dope and R. F. Laker dopes it out, not only truthfully but humorously. Moral: There is One Crop that Never Fails.

THE WASP (Selig), Oct. 28.—Typifying the extreme and dishonest methods a "political boss" will utilize to ruin the opposition candidate in the minds of the voters. Guy Oliver, as Dick Little, secret service operative, and Stella Razeto, as his sweetheart, do some good work in thwarting the plot of "The Wasp" (George Hernandez), who is certainly ideal in type and action; the other characters are well sustained. This is a good man's picture.

WILLIAM HENRY JONES' COURTSHIP (Vitagraph), Oct. 28.—The caption of this picture, while it suggests comedy, is not indicative of the real opportunities which Sidney Drew has been given to exploit his talents as the feature. Jones (Mr. Drew) is convinced that love is blind; after he has accidentally broken his nearsighted glasses; the accident prevents him from making the mistake of his life. Joseph N. Quail has produced a bird of a comedy, and Mr. Drew and his supporting cast make it an unusual release.

THE LOST MELODY (Edison), Oct. 28.—Written and produced by Richard R. Ridgely, involving love episodes which threaten the plans of the obdurate heads of neighboring families. Some very emotional scenes are visualized, and selfish fathers crush the hopes and ambitions of their progeny to accomplish their own ends. The unreasonable parents' cabal results, ultimately, ten years later, in a providential incident which restores "The Lost Melody" and reunites the lovers. Only favorable comment can be bestowed upon this picture.

THE WIFE'S STRATAGEM (Biograph), Oct. 29.—A bewildering sort of a plot evidences itself in the opening scene, but which is straightened out eventually in satisfactory and convincing incidents. Irene Howley, Ivan Christy, Jos. McDermott, Jack Drumier and Marie Newton, respectively the wife, man, husband, peddler and girl, make of this, combining photography and direction, an interesting number.

SNAKEVILLE AND THE CORSET DEMONSTRATOR (Essanay), Oct. 29.—Sophie Clutts, as the corset demonstrator (perfect 38—and then some), cuts a big figure in this offering. All the male inhabitants of Snakeville seem to be awfully interested, and vie with each other in making her stay in their "hum" town pleasant. Slippery Slim gets in bad on the start, and attempts to retaliate on the favored ones by working up an insurrection among the wives of the infatuated husbands. There is something doing all the time and they "do" poor Slim in the finale, and administer to him a dose of his own medicine. A laugh maker.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 70 (Selig), Oct. 29.—After some interesting topical scenes, war pictures are shown, taken on the battlefields of various locations where real action has just been in progress. The scenes are taken showing the conditions after the conflict—ruins of public buildings, churches and private residences. The horrors of war are most vividly shown.

KIDDING THE BOSS (Vitagraph), Oct. 29.—A western comedy tht is as full of meat as a generous pigeon pie, with the scenes laid at "Bar 4" Ranch, where the boys put one over on the boss, who is an unreasonable woman-hater. Doris Schroeder is the author and it has been produced by Ulysses Davis, with the assistance of a fine cast, in an artistic manner. Margaret Gibson very cleverly portrays the "sniffling lead," who wins out, to the surprise of the would-be jokers. Good comedy.

THE TIDES OF SORROW (Biograph), Oct. 30.—A story of the fishing banks—melodramatic, bordering on the tragic, which is rendered by an old-time Biograph cast, including Claire McDowell, W. J. Butler, Frank Evans, Charles H. West and Kate Bruce in the principal roles. The plot contains many thrilling incidents. The marine scenes have been well selected and have been beautifully photographed. This picture is up to the standard of this company's releases.

HAM AND THE VILLAIN FACTORY (Kalem), Oct. 30.—A burlesque on a melodrama by Ruth Roland and Marshal Neilan, in which they play the leading parts. This offering is filled with many ludicrous and comical situations, which are greeted with many well earned laughs. Several of the scenes take place in the Villain Factory, where dirty work is done at reasonable prices—so says the placard on the wall. A laughter producer.

THUMB PRINTS AND DIAMONDS (Lubin), Oct. 30.—The plot of this pictureplay involves all the characters usually used in the stage melodrama. The millionaire, with a lovely daughter, who is also the possessor of a priceless diamond, a crook, who uses all methods and means to "grab" it, also the daughter and a detective who is the crook's rival for the affections of the girl. The troubles they encounter working out the plot are interesting, but considerably trite. The acting and photography are up to the mark. It interests.

THE GREAT IMPEERYUL SIRKUS (Selig), Oct. 30.—A comedy that is full of laughs, as indicated by the spontaneous acknowledgement it receives from the spectators. Everyone who has played circus in their juvenile days on the viewing of this picture will have their minds carried back to bread and butter days, when the sight of an elephant caused goose pimples. How the little tads succeeded in putting one over on their elders is certainly worth seeing—and thoroughly enjoyable.

BUNNY BACKSLIDES (Vitagraph), Oct. 30.—A comedy with a plot that is refined and ingenuous, by Mrs. Tom Coleman, produced by George D. Baker. John Bunny, Josie Sadler, Flora Finch and Charles Eldridge compose a cast whose names guarantee enjoyable entertainment. The vehicle given them embraces the theory of eugenic marriage; imagine the two extremes, Bunny and Finch—here is where the laughs come in. Bunny weighs in at 360 pounds at Sweatems' Sanitarium, where he goes to reduce—at the end of a week he has gained one pound. If you enjoy laughs, see the finish.

HEARTS OF GOLD (Biograph), Oct. 31.—It is the old theme of two women loving the same man. The story is an appealing one, especially to those who are sentimentally inclined. The plot is devoid of suggestiveness. The one woman stifles her love in favor of the other, who is her benefactress. Alfred Paget, Isabel Rea, Katherine Lee, C. Lillard and Hectord V. Sarno are fully adequate in the leading roles. A taking number.

THE HAND OF IRON (Edison), Oct. 31.—A military drama, written by Sumner Williams. Picturesque scenes in and about a military station, which are clearly photographed, are the features of this offering. Although the direction of Langdon West and the acting on the part of the cast are fully adequate, there is a satisfying element missing in the plot and weaknesses in the character of Helen, the colonel's daughter (Gertrude McCoy), which leaves only pity in the mind for the staunch, young lieutenant (Richard Tucker), who asks her to be his wife. A fair offering.

BRONCHO BILLY'S MOTHER (Essanay), Oct. 31.—The usual western story featuring Broncho Billy, who this time essays the role of a "booze fighter." He goes on a rampage and shoots up the town. A visit from his mother humiliates him, and through the sheriff's unsolicited help she is made to believe that he is all right. The incident causes his reform and he swears never to drink again. Some exciting scenes take place in the action.

THE VENGEANCE OF WINONA (Kalem), Oct. 31.—An Indian drama, with Princess Mona Darkfeather as the feature. A good many gripping and thrilling scenes occur during conflicts between the renegades and Indians. There is a love theme running through which creates interest and a pleasant surprise at the end relieves a suspense figuring through the last scenes. An average release.

THE SOUBRETTE AND THE SIMP (Lubin), Oct. 31.—A western comedy concerning a cross road, one night stand, melodramatic company, which goes broke through bad business. A simp cowboy is induced by the manager and soubrette, on whom the simp is stuck, to buy half of the show. His experiences are wild and wonderful. Creative of much laughter. On the same reel with "An Interrupted Nap."

AN INTERRUPTED NAP (Lubin), Oct. 31.—On the same reel with "The Soubrette and the Simp." An animated cartoon by Vincent Whitman which receives hearty laughter.

AT THE TRANSFER CORNER (Selig), Oct. 31.—A comedy drama, by W. E. Wing, which contains a good plot, involving a young couple, the father of the lover and the mother of his sweetheart. Some good street scenes are in evidence, which are finely photographed. The manner in which the young couple circumvent their parents is productive of considerable comedy in the concluding scenes. A very good comedy.

ALL FOR BUSINESS 'Biograph), Nov. 2.—A gripping domestic melodrama, depicting how a man may be so wrapped up in his business that he neglects his family, and lacerates the heart of a loving wife, through thoughtlessness. Several intense emotional scenes occur. Ivan Christy, Augusta Anderson, Jack Mulhall and H. A. Barrows portray the prominent characters most ably. The ending is comparatively satisfactory, though the husband deserved a worse fate than forgiveness. An intense offering.

THE NEW PARTNER (Edison), Nov. 2.—This pictureplay has been reviewed at length by Louis Reeves Harrison in the Moving Picture World and can be found on page 349, issue of Oct. 17, 1914.

THE LAUNDRESS (Essanay), Nov. 2.—A very amusing comedy in which Sweedie (Wallace Berry) figures in a most wonderful deception. Sweedie, who this time is a laundress, through jealousy pretends to drown herself in the dye vat; but she does not die, vat? She rigs up a dummy. The manner in which she fools her tailor lover and wins out is quite laughable.

DOC YAK'S CATS (Selig), Nov. 2.—A comedy animated cartoon which is fairly amusing.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, No. 71 (Selig), Nov. 2.—Picturization of Uncle Sam's greatest warship, City of New York, during speed test; United States Coast Artillery exploding mines in New York harbor; Sylvia Pankhurst, in her address where she claims votes for women will win after the war. War scenes: Undergraduates of Oxford and Cambridge, who have enlisted in the ranks, building winter barracks; Artists' Volunteer Corps being inspected at Earle Court, London, by General Turner; the Belgian army in full retreat from Antwerp; one of the most effective engines of destruction of modern warfare—the armoured automobile, etc.

THE MYSTERY OF BRAYTON COURT (Vitagraph), Nov. 2.—A pictureplay with a mystery plot, which is productive of more than ordinary suspense in its entirety. W. A. Tremayne is the author. Maurice Costello and Robert Gaillord directed and play the leading parts, ably assisted by Thomas R. Mills, Jack Brawn, George Stevens, Estelle Mardo and Enid Hunt. The mystery is solved in the last scenes, to the satisfaction of the spectators. Considering the acting, direction and all details, this release is very commendable.

Licensed Specials

THE TICKET-OF-LEAVE MAN (Biograph), Oct. 27.—Visualized from the old melodrama by Tom Taylor. While few faults can be found with the acting, the modern costuming certainly detracts, seriously, particularly to the older element of spectators who have seen the dramatic version. Possibly this is a modernized version; let us hope so at least. Steam radiators, telephones (especially of the French construction), electric lights and safes with combination locks were not in vogue during Tom Taylor's entity. Considering the existing discrepancies mentioned, it is, however, creditable, in a dramatic sense.

THE BUTTERFLY (Vitagraph), Oct. 27.—A two-part picture drama which contains a strong comedy element, featuring Helen Gardener, supported by an all star cast. Continental and betitled suitors seek her hand and vie with each other until they learn that her father is about to fail. Later they are assured that it is a false alarm, but they all lose out when she chooses as her husband a plain American. This release is worth the viewing.

THE MENACE OF FATE (Kalem), Oct. 28.—Two acts in which Alice Hollister is featured (little Glendora Glendon, impersonating her at the age of four, in the first scenes). The story of the plot concerns a kidnapping, by a woman of the slums, of a little daughter of an aristocratic family. The later scenes illustrate how the victim is forced to live amid miserable surroundings. How she is eventually rescued and established in her proper home is very satisfactory. A picture of much merit in all respects.

THE MOUNTAIN LAW (Lubin), Oct. 28.—A two-part melodramatic feature. The plot of which is laid in the moonshine country. There is the usual feud between two neighboring families, which in the opening scenes has been compromised. The subsequent scenes to the end of the reel illustrate how the feud is almost renewed by unfortunate and tragic happenings. Herman Blackman is the author and the characters are splendidly acted by Louise Huff, Edgar Jones, Arthur Matthews and James Daly. For a moonshine picture it contains unusual merit.

THE WOLF'S DAUGHTER (Lubin), Oct. 29.—A two-part story with a pretentious plot, written by William M. Ritchey and directed by Leon D. Kent. A clever swindler involves persons of repute, whom he meets through their influential friends, in an illegal business. His convent educated daughter, whom he attempts to make his dupe, foils his nefarious schemes. Velma Whitman, as the daughter, ably assisted by prominent members of the stock company, make of this quite an interesting release, with a convincing final.

THE MIDNIGHT RIDE OF PAUL REVERE (Edison), Oct. 30.—This two-part picture has been reviewed at length, by Louis Reeves Harrison, in the Moving Picture World, and can be found on page 193, issue of Oct. 10, 1914.

WHATSOEVER A WOMAN SOWETH (Essanay), Oct. 30.—A two-part picture unfolding a tragedy of selfishness and cowardice, wherein the display of human weaknesses come into vivid contrast with the strength of human nature. The struggles, joys and sorrows of a lifetime encompass the characters in this production. Gerda Holmes, Thomas Commerford, Richard C. Travers, John Cossar and Bryant Washburn make up the able cast. A strong suspense prevails, especially during the closing scenes.

WITHIN AN ACE (Vitagraph), Oct. 31.—A two-part special that is full of inconsistent scenes and the story is long drawn out. There is a flavor of gruesomeness pertaining that is not pleasant to view. Maud Coleborn is the author and Theodore Marston the director. John Costello, Harry Northrup, James Morrison, George Cooper and Dorothy Kelly all act their parts well. The photography and backgrounds are up to the mark. This offering falls far short of the usual Vitagraph releases.

ROSEMARY, THAT'S FOR REMEMBRANCE (Selig), Nov. 2.—A two-part dramatic picture, the caption of which is taken from Shakespeare's Hamlet, from the mouth of Ophelia, "Rosemary, that's for Remembrance." A poor mountain girl is left an orphan and is being raised by a family, friends of her father. There is a love theme involving many scenes of emotion and suspense, which in the finale has a happy ending. Addie McGee, Earle Fox and Lafe McKee do good work as the principals. A meritorious offering.

HIS INSPIRATION (Kalem), Nov. 2.—A two-part picture drama featuring Tom Moore, whose character is that of an egotistical musician and composer. His wife proves to be the one who deserves the credit for his inspirations, and after his undeserved fame he deserts her for another. There is much interest in the final scene, where the egotist is forced to acknowledge his deceptions. A well acted and photographed release of considerable merit.

Independent

A GENTLEMAN OF NERVE (Keystone), Oct. 29.—Chaplin, Conklin and Mabel appear in this interesting bit of nonsense. The chief scenes are taken at an auto race. The gentlemen spill pop over strange ladies and perform a lot of funny antics of an eccentric sort. This is successful in its way.

THE DEAD LINE (Princess), Oct. 30.—A burlesque comedy number. A company of soldiers, the police force and fire department all appear to suppress the invaders, which turns out to be a joke played by the two lovers. They fire a volley of guns over the stone wall. This makes a comedy of average interest.

PAID WITH INTEREST (Majestic), Nov. 1.—A two-part offering with Mae Marsh as the heroine. The story is somewhat weaker than usual with Majestic offerings—it starts off with lively humorous action and then sinks into sentimentality. That it is well acted and has many pleasing qualities will keep it fairly entertaining even to the captious spectator.

CASEY'S VENDETTA (Komic), Nov. 1.—A sprightly little rough business farce made by Ed Dillon, who in it plays Casey, a flirtatious cop. Fay Tincher is a very fetching Italian owner of a fruit stand. A man wop, who has another fruit stand up the street a bit, loves her. Mrs. Casey, a fat Irish woman, has a large part in the denouement. The sub-titles are in verse that goes aptly with the action and helps out the picture. It is pretty sure as an entertainer of all kinds of spectators.

SHEP'S RACE WITH DEATH (Thanhouser), Nov. 1.—The mother-in-law's appearance temporarily wrecks the home of the girl twins, the mother and father separating, each taking a child. The events which bring the family together again are very stirring and full of anxious suspense. The big dog, Shep, pulls the runaway horse off the railroad track, where it had stopped, thus saving the life of one twin. This is well-pictured and very entertaining.

MUTUAL GIRL NO. 42 (Reliance), Nov. 2.—About the same in quality as usual and very fair entertainment.

LOVERS' POST-OFFICE (Keystone), Nov. 2.—A reel of amusing nonsense, in which the lovers post their letters in a box in a tree. The old man gets wise and sets a snare, by which he catches Fatty's hand. The girl releases the snare and Fatty hooks the old man by the leg. This is well pictured and contains numerous laughs.

THE BOY MAYOR (Nestor), Nov. 3.—This pictures Eugene J. Rich and Earl R. Goodwin as the boy mayor of Portland and his secretary. They apparently represent some juvenile organization in that city in which boys aid in rounding up youthful offenders. The reel does not make it clear just how much is fact and how much fiction. The story itself concerns a raid on a gang of boy criminals and is only fairly strong.

FALSE PRIDE (Majestic), Nov. 3.—A simple story of an extravagant girl, whose expenditures bring her father to ruin. Her sweetheart chides her and the girl's suffering is pathetic when she realizes what she has done. A natural story with a situation in it that is not overdrawn. The young couple are pleasing and the story altogether makes quite an appeal.

THE MINER'S PERIL (Reliance), Nov. 4.—A series of incidents in this picture grip with elemental force, and we think it is a very safe offering to spectators who seek diversion and entertainment. In the pictures a mine owner is bound and left suspended over a deep pit in a bucket. In a little cabin, not far away, the miner's wife, tied to a post, sees a candle ready to ignite and burn through the ropes that hold the bucket up. When the rope breaks her husband will be precipitated to his death. But then some astonishing things happen and the rescue is convincingly contrived. The director of the picture is Arthur Mackley.

"CURSES! THEY REMARKED" (Keystone), Nov. 5.—A burlesque on the false guardian's story, with amusing moments. Chester Conklin is the guardian's son and makes life miserable for the girl with his unwelcome attentions. The hero appears and there is an exciting chase. The close is very funny.

DOT'S CHAPERONE (Sterling), Nov. 5.—A Max Asher number, in which Max disguises himself as a woman and hires out as chaperone for his sweetheart. The action does not lead up to any very humorous situations. It makes altogether a fair offering.

MAX'S MONEY (Royal), Nov. 7.—A comedy number in which the butler and his wife, who is a maid, leave the home of their employer unoccupied. They go to the beach for a time and mistake the nature of the pursuit. The butler is surprised to learn, when captured, that he has inherited half a million dollars. This is well pictured and contains a good deal of amusement; it is well up to the average.

HIS MUSICAL CAREER (Keystone), Nov. 7.—Chas. Chaplin and Ambrose disport themselves in this number as a pair of piano movers. They get a lot of eccentric humor out of this and of course succeed in getting things decidedly mixed. The burro helps in getting laughs. A good number.

AT THE CRUCIAL MOMENT (Eclair), Nov. 8.—This number pictures a series of creepy scenes in which an insane young doctor holds up the nurses and other physicians while he starts to perform an operation on the patient. The joke at the end, in which it was all shown to be the way moving pictures are made, would have been stronger if the prior scenes had not been so grewsome.

THE FATAL MARRIAGE (L. K. O.), Nov. 8.—A farce with Jewish characters and some business that distinctly reminds one of another brand. It is one of those lively and laugh-compelling offerings that is a bit vulgar; yet is funny enough to keep protestations from being heard.

THE STOLEN MASTERPIECE (American), Nov. 11.—There is little freshness in showing a young man prove his worth and make himself acceptable as son-in-law by tracking down thieves who have stolen a picture from the gallery of the girl's father. In the business there is much, naturally, that is new, and it is always interesting to watch clearly-drawn action brought forward toward its climax and final denouement. It may prove to many a fairly acceptable offering. The photography and staging of the picture are good.

THE FRANKFURTER SALESMAN'S DREAM (Joker), Nov. 11.—Ernest Shield appears in this as a Dutch sausage maker. He puts dogs in the machine and out come the frankfurters; also two trained bears are chopped up. During his dream the frankfurters again assume life and chase him around. There are some funny situations in this. The photography is good.

SIS DOBBINS, OIL MAGNATE (Powers), Nov. 13.—Edna Maison and Joe King play the part of two country lovers. Oil is discovered on the Dobbins place, the girl goes to school and comes back greatly improved. She remains true to Joe. This is pleasing without being very strong. It is attractively pictured.

WHEN THE GIRLS WERE SHANGHAIED (Nestor), Nov. 13.—A pleasing comedy number, in which the young wives dress up as boys and go slumming. Their husbands garb themselves as sailors and shanghai the girls. They set them to scrubbing decks, climbing the yard arm and other tasks which make them glad to reveal their identity. A pleasing little comedy.

WHEN LIZZIE WENT TO COLLEGE (Nestor), Nov. 14.—In this comedy-burlesque Victoria Forde plays the part of a Western girl in a girls' college. She is accustomed to mingling with cowboys and her antics in the college are decidedly funny. The girls laugh at her until she saves them from a burglar. This is a good characterization of the burlesque type and succeeds in evoking much laughter from observers.

FOOLS AND PAJAMAS (Joker), Nov. 14.—The two drug clerks send the girl some hair remover and hair restorer. She turns this over to her friends at a house party and the girls use it with astonishing results. The photography is good, but the humor is not particularly strong.

DEFEAT OF FATHER (Joker), Nov. 14.—A comedy novelty in which the entire story is told by showing only the feet of the various characters. Flirting, skating and falling down are all shown. This succeeds fairly well.

MAX IN A DIFFICULT POSITION (Pathe).—This is short, but it is played by the real Max (Max Linder) and that is enough to insure it a welcome. It is not wholly fresh, but it is fun maker.

WHIFFLES' NIGHTMARE (Pathe).—We don't remember seeing Max Linder and Whiffles appearing together on the same reel before—it is quite an event and will attract notice. Whiffles plays two parts as usual and the double exposure is so skillfully contrived that it defies detection. The farce is acceptable and the two together, regardless of the popularity of these two comedians, makes a good offering.

MOTHER'S DARLING LITTLE BOY (Pathe).—Good acting and a band of well trained kids make this a very acceptable offering. The minister's son is "Mother's darling" at home; but outside and as leader of the terrible band of pirates he is far from recognizable as the little angel who says "Now I lay me" before mother tucks him in at night. It is amply serviceable farce comedy.

THE RAINBOW'S END (Warner's Features).—A picture made by the Miller 101 Ranch. It is a story of the wide southwestern country with some splendid pictures of a great cattle ranch. The action is of good melodramatic quality and has been clearly put on the screen. The offering is commendable as an offering somewhat more than safe as an entertainment giver.

A MOUNTAIN GOAT (Warner's Features).—A one-reel rough-business comedy that we think will prove a scream. The "mountain goat" is a Lizzy-boy, the only man at a mountain hotel till six college men out on a tramp together arrive. The spinster who must get a man by hook or crook is also there and lively things ensue.

Independent Specials

THE TURNING OF THE ROAD (Thanhouser), Nov. 3.—In this two-reel number Muriel Ostriche plays the daughter of a gentleman crook. The opening scenes at the big hotel are attractive. The girl is induced by her father to steal the jewels, which she hides in the minister's grip. The later invasion of the minister's home holds interest well. In the end she confesses her deception, the father is captured, and the girl marries the minister. This is not a powerful story, but it is an attractive one and handles its familiar subject matter in an entertaining way.

A WOMAN SCORNED (Reliance), Nov. 7.—A two-reel crook story notable for the sense of reality the performers give the various parts. Mary Alden is particularly strong in the character of Mag, whom Jack throws over. Eugene Pallette plays the latter part. The picture opens with the two pals preparing nitroglycerin and later cracking a safe. The interest is held firmly throughout the entire two reels and for a story dealing entirely with the seamy side of life this is strongly presented. The final scenes are exciting. A strong thief story.

THE TEAR THAT BURNED (Majestic), Nov. 8.—A two-reel number of exceptional charm, though it deals with the seamy side of life. Lillian Gish plays a girl from the country who runs away from her drunken father and reaches the city. A Chinatown loafer makes a thief of her. In the second reel she impersonates a girl who died, in order to steal the jewels from a blind mother. In spite of these incidents the ending is a happy one and very effective. This is unusually well photographed and is handled in such a way that its appeal is much above the average.

HIS TRYSTING PLACES (Keystone), Nov. 9.—A two-reel offering in which Chaplin and Mabel and Ambrose appear. An interchange of overcoats leads to all sorts of family troubles in two homes. Chaplin does some particularly amusing stunts in this and the fun runs high through the entire two reels. This is eccentric comedy that should have wide appeal.

A SLICE OF LIFE (American), Nov. 9.—A loss of memory story in two reels—it is more interesting than its kind usually is; but is sentimental rather than dramatic. There is good acting in it and good photography and many scenes of charm from every viewpoint.

THE LAST TRUMP (Gold Seal), Nov. 10.—The fifteenth and last instalment of The Trey o' Hearts series, in three reels. This brings to a decidedly successful close this adaptation of Louis Joseph Vance's thrilling yarn, and the final number is abounding in mysterious and exciting happenings. Not until the last reel is the observer sure of what will happen. All of the principals have done their work consistently and well in this series. Alan Law and Cleo Madison have performed some daring feats and the interest has seldom lagged. The director is to be congratulated on carrying through the series the dual role of Rose and Judith, played by Miss Madison, without confusion. Followers of the story will find the last instalment intensely interesting. The setting is the beautiful Mission Inn at Riverside, Cal.

DESTINY'S NIGHT (Broncho), Nov. 11.—A strong two-reel story of a gentleman thief and a well-dressed woman thief who invade a home vacated for the summer. While they are inside a baby is left by its mother at the door. This entire production is far above the average crook play in human interest. The developments are surprising, but come about in a very natural, convincing way. The baby brings reformation to the evil pair. A finely developed story with good sentiment in it and with an interesting pull on the interest in every scene. A good offering.

FOR THE MASTERY OF THE WORLD (Eclair), Nov. 11.—A three-reel subject, introducing the same characters who appeared in "Adventures in Diplomacy," including Alec Francis, Edward Roseman and Belle Adair. The story runs along entertainingly, without any very dramatic incidents. At the same time there is a good air of mystery preserved. The nature of the wireless bomb and the desire of the government for suppressing it were not made extremely clear, but in this class of stories the observer is willing to take a good deal for granted. The photography and acting are commendable and the production as a whole strikes a good average of interest.

THE YELLOW STREAK (Eclair), Nov. 11.—A two-reel story with a sporting turn to it. Richard Garrick appears as Kid Donovan, a pugilist, who abandons the ring at his sweetheart's request, to become a fireman. He is accused of being yellow, but later proves his bravery as a fireman. He then fights once more in the ring to raise funds for the girl during an illness and is of course forgiven. This story is conventional in tone and familiar in incident, but it nevertheless holds the attention throughout. It is well up to the average.

THE FRIEND (Domino), Nov. 12.—This is a strong two-reel offering, which successfully handles a delicate theme. The tragic close is disappointing in a way, but undoubtedly carries a stronger moral for this reason. This first pictures a young artist living with his pretty model. Later he decides to marry and leaves her. Three years after his best friend falls in love with the model, who has become a successful miniature painter, and is about to marry her. The artist feels in duty bound to tell his friend of her past. This ruins the girl's life and she commits suicide. This is worked out in a delicate, absorbing way and presents the problem in a strong manner. The cast is a good one and the photography pleasing.

THE HATEFUL GOD (Kay-Bee), Nov. 13.—A two-reel subject in which the father of two girls is a bigoted churchman, scorning all forms of enjoyment. The girls run away to attend a circus and one is injured. The other leaves home because of her father's narrowness of mind. Later a city mission worker induces her to return and restores family happiness by reasoning with the father. This production makes the most of its theme, though none of the incidents are of exceptional interest. It makes on the whole about an average offering.

THOSE WERE THE HAPPY DAYS (Nestor), Nov. 13.—A two-reel comedy offering in which Eddie Lyons and Victoria Forde play the lovers. Their affair is interfered with and her parents send her to a Girls' school. Eddie promptly impersonates a professor and gets a job teaching there. Lee Moran plays the part of the ubiquitous janitor, who exposes the lovers. Stories of this type have been rather frequent lately. This is well-pictured and lightly amusing.

THE GIRL OF THE PEOPLE (Victor), Nov. 13.—A two-reel number featuring Mary Fuller in adventures from her days as an immigrant child until she becomes a famous dancer. This is told as a running picture narrative. On arriving in America she is placed in a sweat-shop. Six years later she flees from the insulting manager, is adopted by gypsies, flees from them in turn believing she has killed a man, and later learns to dance. She marries the famous artist who paints her portrait. The scenes in this are all entertaining; without being a powerful story in any way it holds the interest and is pleasing.

PEG O' THE WILD (Imp), Nov. 13.—A two-reel story in which a man named Saunders flees with his baby daughter to the wilds after committing a crime. Years later two young detectives discover the girl, dressed in skins, living with her half-demented father. A love affair develops and there is some good comedy when one of the men brings the girl her first clothes. The father is identified and the girl's mother appears. Later the old man dies. Wm. E. Shay, Violet Mersereau and Hobart Henley are in the cast. The photography is good and the production entertaining, though of a somewhat familiar type.

THE NINETY BLACK BOXES (Bison), Nov. 14.—The fifth of the Villon series and one of the most interesting. Murdock MacQuarrie as the vagabond poet embarks on a plan to release the prisoners of the monstrous John Ballue. He visits the dungeons and succeeds in his purpose, but Ballue himself escapes. This has the usual excellence of costume and setting which have marked this entire series. Mr. MacQuarrie again enters into the spirit of Villon and carries the interest of the observer with him. A good number.

THE MEXICAN HATRED (Warner's Features), a three-reel offering dealing with recent conditions on the Mexican border and evolved from the Mexican hatred of American soldiers. The colonel's son, a young lieutenant, has shot a Mexican spy trying to escape and the man's wife vows revenge. Her chance comes. She has thrown a stone at him and hit him on the head. He loses his memory. The Mexicans take him home and fill his mind with hatred of his friends. He becomes their leader against Americans. The ending is melodramatic and acceptable. It is a safe offering and will be liked.

THE STRANGER (Box Office Attraction).—A sensational two-reel offering with the White Star brand. Its hero is a detective, "the stranger," who discovers the whereabouts of a girl captive of a gang of toughs with a den hid among shanties along a wild water-front of a city. He has hair-raising adventures, but with the help of the police whom he warns by a note thrown from a window, he brings the gangsters to justice. There is a good fighting chase in motor boats on the sea. It is a picture that will hold well and, we think, satisfy the spectators' love of adventure.

THE LAST CHORD (Warner's Features).—A three-reel picture made in Italy by the Savoia studio and filled with lovely scenes and backgrounds. The acting is unusually strong and the big thing in it is the madness of the heroine which lasts through too many scenes to be entertaining. The story is hardly vital and, in spite of its many excellencies, the offering can not be counted a sure feature for amusement loving spectators.

THE TERRORS OF A GREAT CITY (Warner's Features).—A three-reel melodrama that is truly filled with lively action and astonishingly sensational business. With the right audience it will be the biggest scream ever, while a more simple audience may be held spellbound by it. The heroines (there are two) are pretty and personable and the photography and acting are commendable. The story deals with German army officers. The villain, the heroine's father, sells secrets and gets her lover, also an army officer, accused.

THROUGH FIRE AND WATER (Box Office Attractions).—There are some fine thunderstorm scenes in this two-reel offering and it has a rescue of a child from a house on fire. The dream warning that brought the rescuers to the fire is not strongly convincing and the whole story is rather improbable. It is the kind of picture that will be watched to the close with interest, but not the kind that will deeply engage the spectator's faculties. The photography is good.

THE VOW (Box Office Attractions).—A three-reel picture made in California where the country passes very well as its ostensible Italian background. The best thing in it is a bit of master picture-making and shows a man struggling with big waves on a rocky coast. It has a convincing and personable heroine and is well acted with many charming scenes; but the story is far-fetched and as a whole fails to grip all the spectator's faculties.

LITTLE JACK (Box Office Attractions).—A three-reel Balboa offering with Jackie Saunders in the title role, a girl who has been brought up by a rough bandit uncle and is dressed as a boy. She saves a rich lumberman who puts up at their lonely house over night and then runs away for fear of punishment. She falls in with another gang of thieves and is wounded while helping them rob the city office of the lumberman. Later, on being recognized, she is given a home and in the end is the means of saving her benefactor from the thieving of his dishonest partner. There is action all through the piece and it is likely to prove a very acceptable entertainer in spite of the fact that it does not tell a strongly convincing story.

STATE DEPARTMENT REFUSES TO CONDEMN "THE ORDEAL."

Jesse J. Goldburg, secretary and executive manager of the Life Photo Film Corporation, returned last Friday from Washington, where he consulted with Acting Secretary of State Robert Lansing and Third Assistant Secretary of State Phillips, with respect to the Life Photo Film Corporation's latest five-part feature release "The Ordeal," adapted from a poem revolving about the Franco-Prussian war.

The negotiations with the Department of State were as a result of certain protests against the possible release of "The Ordeal" on the part of certain German societies who maintained that the production might possibly violate the proclamation of neutrality of President Wilson.

The contention of the Life Photo Film Corporation was that "The Ordeal" did not pretend to depict any true state of affairs, but was merely a poetic adaptation, and whatever realism was portrayed in the picture did not detract from the fact that the company never claimed the picture recited any true events possibly connected with the present unfortunate state of affairs in Europe.

Assistant Secretary of State Phillips, after thoroughly going into the matter with Acting Secretary of State Lansing, and Mr. Goldburg, finally determined that the Department of State would not prohibit the exhibition of "The Ordeal," and would not entertain any complaint against it.

Mrs. Thomas Whiffen.

WHEN the Cosmos Feature Film Corporation release the five-part photoplay, "Hearts and Flowers," there will undoubtedly be many who would like to know more concerning that delightful old lady, Mrs. Thomas Whiffen, who plays the title role. To those this brief resume is respectfully dedicated. For forty-six years Mrs. Thomas Whiffen has been on the stage and most of those years have been devoted to playing old lady parts in conjunction with some of the best-known stars in this country.

Mrs. Thomas Whiffen.

In 1869 Mrs. Thomas Whiffen came to America from England and early resolved to make a specialty of old lady parts. In speaking of the past, Mrs. Whiffen says, "Even as a young woman I powdered my hair and made up much older than I was; I was never a beauty and so I had to try to be clever," and surely Mrs. Whiffen has proven a performer of unusual cleverness.

Mrs. Whiffen had the distinction of playing Buttercup in the original production of Gilbert & Sullivan's "Pinafore" in the Old Duff Opera Company in New York. Later she appeared in the famous Hazel Kirke production, when that play ran for 486 nights in New York; in this production Mrs. Whiffen played Mercy Kirke, the wife. Mrs. Whiffen was also associated with the Madison Square Company; in association with E. M. Holland, Jeffries Lewis, Eben Plimpton, George Payvan, Herbert Kelcey and other players of equal note.

Next Mrs. Whiffen joined the Lyceum Company, which will be remembered by many Chicago theater-goers, playing the part of the blind Mother in "The Charity Ball," in which Mrs. Whiffen created one of her best roles. A few years ago many others will remember with delight "The Builder of Bridges" with the late Kyrle Bellew, a play in which Mrs. Whiffen had a big part. As Mrs. Talcott, an elderly companion and chaperone, with Ethel Barrymore in "Tante," Mrs. Whiffen proved a delight beyond words.

At the present writing Mrs. Whiffen is and has been delighting audiences at the Lyceum Theater, portraying the part of Mme. De Trevillac, Helen's Grandmother, in "The Beautiful Adventure," a new comedy in three acts, which has been "literally packing them in," in a great measure due to the remarkable work of Mrs. Thomas Whiffen, the grand old lady of the American stage.

DAMM OPENS PICTURE THEATER.

Louis Damm recently opened a moving picture theater in Osgood, Ind., which is said to be one of the prettiest little picture houses in that state. Its construction and wiring met with the approval of the Chief Fire Marshal of Indiana. The house will not be opened each night of the week, but on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday nights the inhabitants of Osgood may invest in the good entertainment that the management of the new theater will give. G. B. McClelland is the manager. The admission prices are 5 and 10 cents.

"A Magnet for Quality"

In This Way Walter H. Seeley Characterizes the Mission of the Alco Company—Seeley and Lichtman Are Proud of "Salomy Jane" and Talk Interestingly of Film Conditions and of Their Own Future Plans.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE development of the feature and of the feature market is of prime interest to exhibitors all over the country. Scarcely any other subject is more frequently discussed by and among them, and scarcely any other is more vital from the exhibitors' standpoint. The program is the life-blood of the motion picture theatre and the unfailing barometer of its success, and the feature is the life-blood of the program at least in the bigger theatres, the number of which is constantly increasing just as the old "shanty" with its hideous front of daubed "paper" is constantly disappearing.

Walter Hoff Seeley.

Of the new organizations which specialize in what they hope to be superior feature service not the least active and certainly not the least ambitious is the Alco Company, now firmly located in a building of its own.

Such a place and all places like it are never entirely without a budget of interesting news—interesting to filmdom in general and to exhibitors in particular.

The immediate cause and reason for my seeking out the energetic heads of the Alco, to wit, "Al" Lichtman and Walter H. Seeley, was "Salomy Jane." There are mighty few pictures these days that one loves and therefore does not criticise and "Salomy Jane" is just that kind of a picture. I felt that the readers of The Moving Picture World would share in my interest and might want to take a second look at the men who will handle "Salomy Jane." They of course had nothing to do with the making of the picture. The picture has been a long time in the making, as most good pictures must be, and these columns have not been barren of information as to incidents in the process of production, etc. Messrs. Lichtman and Seeley are making no effort to suppress their enthusiasm for "Salomy Jane," the most pretentious of all purely and emphatically American motion pictures. It is an all-American production, born in the brain of such an American as Bret Harte, made in an American paradise and with American light and played by Americans overflowingly happy in the thought that they were visualizing fine, noble and rugged American types.

Al Lichtman.

"If we take pride," said President Seeley, "in such a production as 'Salomy Jane,' it is not a purely selfish pride by any means. We will rejoice in any good picture no matter by whom made or by whom distributed, because every good picture and every improvement in quality means an advance all along the line of the industry. Competition in improving quality is the happiest possible condition and the surest promise of a great future for the motion picture. We aim to make the exchange more than a mere point of distribution. We want this office to be regarded everywhere as a magnet for quality, where producers will be eager to bring and offer their best."

Here an emphatic "Yes" came from the direction of Lichtman, who remarked upon the swift changes that had overtaken the film industry within the last few months. Said he:

"The day when the exhibitor and the exchange man were wrapped up in the one thought how to buy at the lowest possible price regardless of all other things. These were indeed trying days for the manufacturer. He could not do himself justice and the seeds of quality fell upon stony ground."

"With many if these producers who had good ideas and often high ideals," Mr. Seeley resumed, "it was, so to speak, a hand-to-mouth existence. We aim to free the ambitious and capable producer from the worry and doubt which distribution has heretofore entailed. Our producers have agreed to start a surplus fund which you might say is a sort of reserve guarantee of quality and there will be no dividends until the reserve fund has been amply secured."

"What about the exhibitor?" I interposed.

"In that respect," answered Lichtman, "I might call attention to the fact that on my recent transcontinental trip I found scarcely one so-called legitimate theatre between Chicago and the Coast given up exclusively to legitimate attractions. You read 'Daniel Frohman presents,' or 'Belasco presents, or 'Griffith presents' such and such a film play.

"In considering the needs and policies of the exhibitor," added President Seeley, "we constantly bear in mind that he depends on a regular supply of high average quality. No theatre can prosper if in selecting their features they have to pay one thousand dollars a week for one attraction, perhaps three hundred for the next and a hundred for the next, and then be left without anything for the following week. I am not venting theories, but recounting in my mind many concrete instances that I have observed in various parts of the country. We have thought it wise policy, beneficial to the exhibitor and in the long run to ourselves, to average prices which will place the very best within reasonable reach. The man who wants one good feature every week gets all we have, our very best emphatically included. There will positively be no exceptional scales and no exceptional prices. We thoroughly and sincerely believe in the benefits and possibilities of our policy. The big motion picture theatre and the big exhibitor of the future will be our best friend. There are some men, especially some men in the theatrical business, who view the great success of the motion picture exhibitor with a good deal of skepticism. The other day I met Paul Keith, who, in speaking of the phenominal success of a certain motion picture theatre in this city, spoke of it as 'just a passing fancy.' I reminded him that when Keith's theatre was opened in Boston every one spoke of it as 'Keith's Folly.' That was twenty years ago. A couple of weeks ago I had occasion to go to Boston, and there was the same theatre, more successful than ever and no longer called 'Keith's Folly.' We have so far lived up to all our promises; our first release appeared on schedule time and we propose to go on in this way. All our efforts are directed toward this one end: We want to take the premium off mediocrity and put it on superiority, where it belongs. We make this plain to all manufacturers who are now affiliated with us or may want to affiliate with us hereafter. No man can do his best in the producing of motion pictures unless he is assured of a steady revenue, just as no author can do his best if he must worry about the possibilities of the sale of his book. The producer who comes to us with a first-class film may be assured of a substantial advance and then of a royalty on his production which will be solely dependent on quality."

"And," concluded Mr. Lichtman, "as adaptations must needs cease and Broadway stars cannot go on forever, screen stars and screen originality must be the elements of future success in the production of those high-class films without which the industry can never attain its fullest measure of artistic success and material prosperity."

I came away from the interview fully persuaded that "Salomy Jane," which will make a profound impression as a work of the best American film art, is in good hands as far as its distribution is concerned.

"The Temple of Moloch"

An Exceptionally Good Edison One-Reel for Minds That Are Not Primitive.

BESIDES offering a splendid subject, the way it is handled by Mary Mechtold Rider as author, and Langdon West as director, raises "The Temple of Moloch" far above the average reel. The average release, with its weary duplication of wornout plots, with its eternal triangle, gunplay and chase, is getting on the nerves of spectators quite as well as of critics. From the dull grey of dispiriting mediocrity, occasionally comes a cheering flash of what stirs the mind and heart and shows what moving pictures could be if they were treated as the expression of something worth expressing. "The Temple of Moloch," unlike the average release, is worth telling through any medium, and is therefore worth telling on the screen.

It is a story, and one reaching tender human sensibilities at times, quickening what is best in the universal heart, awakening recognition of our mutual relations, of our obligations to one another, and it is told as a story, not as as essay, by the author. Director West treats it with sympathetic understanding and the acting is beyond reproach. Mr. Harold Vosburgh easily carries off the honors in his manly interpretation of a practitioner engaged in special service. It is his dignified stand that brings an avaricious factory owner to a realization that he owes something more than wages to his employees. One of his victims, a role well interpreted by Carlton King, assists in the redemption by an impassioned denunciation of his employer when the latter's son and daughter fall victims to a dread disease that has hitherto destroyed people of smaller resistance. King's denunciation would have been more effective with a more suitable background than that of a front porch. It was such an exhibition of ferocious hate as is strong enough in itself to stand a commonplace setting, but worth placing where it could be delivered with greater force.

While the reformation of character in the factory owner does not furnish a new theme, it is given larger significance by realistic treatment. There is an obvious reason why such a conversion should be brought about, a reason all people of minds not primitive will be quick to appreciate. The play is produced in co-operation with the National Association for the Prevention of Tuberculosis, is nominated a "Red Cross Seal Story," but it can stand on its intrinsic merits without any such support.

MR. BLOOMFIELD ISSUES WARNING.

F. P. Bloomfield from Pittsburgh issues a warning against one J. S. Cummings, who, it is said, has represented that he is looking for a moving picture theater, and has money in bank. Mr. Bloomfield last heard of Cummings in Pittsburgh, but is skeptical as to his return.

"The Burglar and the Lady"

J. J. Corbett Plays His Old Part of Gentleman Burglar in Blaché Six-Reel Picture from Langdon McCormack's Melodrama.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE story told by McCormack's melodrama would be proof against even poor direction, and has been made a very effective six-part offering by the skillful direction of Herbert Blaché. In the first place he has chosen a good cast of players and has made excellent use of them. Besides this, his ability to get on the screen convincing continuity of background is marked and is again delightfully illustrated in this offering—there is, it is true, a short group of scenes near the close of the story (where the police are chasing the burglar over some roofs), in which this naturalness and realism are for the moment lessened; but for the most part the transitions from scene to scene are most satisfying. There is one quality in which the Blaché studio is at present pre-eminent, and that is the use of lighting—the lighting in this picture is of Gaumont quality, and that is pretty close to perfection. The six reels are filled with glimpses of lamplight and sunlight and moonlight scenes that art could hardly surpass. In getting these, of course, the scene builder, director, cameraman and player all have a part, and the credit goes to team work. The popular quality of the picture's story and the skill with which it has been put on make it an offering safely to be depended on to amuse and please the average spectator.

The Raffles hero (not the most popular kind of hero at present) is played by the one-time champion, James J. Corbett, who as most know is a very able actor—he fills the role well. The character is Raffles at night and Danvers, a private detective, by day, or whenever it suits his convenience. If he gets caught doing any little job, why he brazenly tells the police detectives that he almost caught the burglar and they merely wonder at his ability to get "on the job" so quickly. This double character of detective and criminal gives to the story its peculiar flavor and permits in the development one or two very telling and unusually dramatic situations.

The lady is played by Claire Whitney, whose frail, lily-like kind of beauty and delicate coloring—her abilities as an actress have been proven in many a fine picture before this—make her the perfect player for this story. Fraunie Fraunholtz fills the role of butler (he is Raffles' accomplice) with distinction. Mr. Fraunholtz is strong at character drawing, but is tempted to over-do now and then. These are suppotted by a large number of others who also carry their business very well. It is, to sum up, an offering that can be safely relied upon to satisfy.

SELZNICK MAKES TOUR OF BRANCHES.

Lewis J. Selznick, general manager of the World Film Corporation, left New York, Saturday, Oct. 24, for a tour of inspection of the World Film Corporation branch offices. His first stop was Pittsburgh. From there he is to visit in turn Chicago, Minneapolis, Kansas City, St. Louis, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit and Buffalo. Mr. Selznick plans to be back within ten days, as there are several large propositions to be closed by that time.

Pathe Melodrama from Novel Popular Twenty Years Ago—Shows How a Son Was Like His Evil Father—Other Subjects.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE theme handled in this picture does not give one of the deeply interesting views of life; but it has been plausibly worked up and so both engages attention and holds in suspense. That a cowardly and dishonest father should bequeath his evil character to his son, though the boy had never seen or heard of him and had been brought up by honorable people, appeals to the intellect rather than to the heart directly. But it is not an insignificant topic and furnishes many chances to develop an emotional appeal through the fates of those connected with them by deep rooted ties.

Scene from "The Taint" (Pathe).

The boy's mother is, in this case, the center of the picture's interest and in the first part of the picture excites much sincere sympathy. The last episode, after the woman who had gone to prison for the murder committed by the father of her son, has become a detective, will not bear analysis. Yet the interest though of a different order is kept up by a train of sensational happenings, each of them filled with marked suspense, regardless of its place in the story as a whole. These incidents culminate in a chase of the criminal in a stolen locomotive by the officers of the law in a second engine, and we are shown the sensational wrecking of the fugitive's locomotive—an actual derailment at a pretty good speed.

The acting is for the most part excellent. Ruby Hoffman plays the woman; Paul Chilton, the villain, and Creighton Hale, the boy. The staging is of high order and the photography is clear. It is four reels long.

"The Fireman and the Girl."

After the city fireman, on vacation, rescues the ragged princess of the woods whom her caitiff foster father holds captive in a cave under the falls, the action of this picture turns to sheer comedy and fitly becomes as merry as wedding chimes. It is a very likeable picture in three reels; but the pleasure that it gives is due mostly to the characters and the atmosphere that they live in and very little to the story.

In olden days the caitiff knight became, through his feudal rights, possessed as guardian of a beautiful maiden, always an heiress, and his object in forcing her to marry against her will was to strengthen his house or party in some way. This gave the true knight a chance to rescue her and win both girl and wealth. Transferred to the mountains of today the heroine cannot be an heiress, and there is no strong object in the foster father's wanting to force a marriage on her. But even so transferred and out of place, the story remains interesting; for the girl is still a maiden in distress and as such finds a hero—in this case it is the fireman.

The background of the picture is that beautiful lake region of New York with its fertile ground and its peculiar deep glens and waterfalls. The characters are in themselves likeable. Elsie Esmond plays the girl, ragged genius of a ferny mountainside, and is full of sprightliness and playfulness. Thurlow Bergen plays the fireman. Frank Brownlee plays the "old man," and Robin Townlee, his son. All do very well, indeed. The camera work is commendable and the offering will go. It was made by the Whartons for Pathe.

"The Crown of Richard III."

There is probably no more pathetic incident in history than the doing to death of those two little princes who stood in the way of the ambitious Duke of Clarence, Richard III. All will recall the gentle words Shakespeare puts in the mouth of the little Duke of York to account for his shortness—"Small plants have grace; great weeds to grow apace," and so on. The picture shows them left by their father's death, whom it makes the cruel Richard poison, to the tender graces of this terrible uncle. One dare not term the story strictly historical; but it has a good measure of suspense and most certainly interests.

Scene from "The Crown of Richard III" (Pathe).

The chief value of the offering—it is three reels long—comes from the dignity of its scenes. The scene making it worthy high praise and the picture, as a whole, is one of exceptional beauty. It was made by the French Pathe Company and some of its scenes were, we are told, taken in London. We can't be certain; but it is plausible enough, for these portals, castelated battlements, carved stone well-rims, grand stairs and palace rooms and donjon keeps have the grandeur of the old time in them. It is a graceful, dignified and very pleasing offering.

K. HEDWIG WITHDRAWS FROM HARVARD FILM.

William K. Hedwig, well and favorably known in the trade, has sold out his interest in the Harvard Film Corporation, and is busily engaged in preparing a series of productions which will shortly be placed on the market, with headquarters in the Knickerbocker Theatre Building.

During his long term of administration as laboratory superintendent of the Imp and Universal Companies, and since then in the office of executive and technical superintendent for the Harvard Film Corporation, Mr. Hedwig has made his capabilities well recognized.

It is reported that Mr. Hedwig is prepared to entertain film propositions of any nature.

Carleton to Direct "The Idler" and Capt. Jinks

Lloyd B. Carleton, one of America's best known film directors, now directing for the William Fox Wonderful Play and Players Corporation, is now engaged in the production of "The Idler," an old play by C. Hadden Chambers, and "Captain Jinks," by Clyde Fitch, both in five parts. In spite of Mr. Carleton's success as producer of Andrew Mack's picture "The Ragged Earl" and "Michael Strogoff," handled while he was a director for Lubin, it is expected that he will turn out even better work in the two new plays. Mr. Carleton staged both of them while he was a director in the legitimate.

Catherine Countiss and Charles Richman have been engaged for the leading parts in "The Idler" and are now hard at work on the film in the Pathe studios in Jersey City. When Carleton was stage director for Frohman he first produced "Captain Jinks" and the knowledge of every minute detail of staging, together with his knowledge of the film conditions, will stand him in good stead in preparing this famous play for the films.

"The Second Mrs. Tanqueray"

An Artistic Two-Reel Picture with Constance Crawley and Arthur Maude, Offered by Warner's Features.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

WHILE it remains true that the best motion pictures are not made from great novels or from great dramas, there is always a special and growing demand for really good pictures of the world's masterpieces. The world, we believe, prefers them, too, not played by Sarah Bernhardts, but by artists who have, either through gift of nature or through hard work before the camera, the faculty of portraying emotions and also the mind's perceptions that is graphic. The real center of a picture is the player's face. Let the rest of the body be as eloquent as you please, the modern photoplayer makes up for loss of vocal expression by a new sign language of facial expression. This never could get across on the stage, because it never could be seen even in the front row. That Constance Crawley by natural endowment and through earnest practice has a wonderful command of this sign language, is widely known. In this picture of Sir Arthur Pinero's tragedy, she has a glorious chance and has made splendid use of it.

She is well supported, too, by Arthur Maude and a distinguished cast with no weak spots; but "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray"—so far as can be judged from this picture of it—is far more truly a play of one character than even Hamlet is. The second Mrs. Tanqueray is a woman with a past. She had tried to tell Tanqueray about her adventures before the marriage, but he refused to let her. After the ceremony, she finds that she can not fit into the sphere to which her husband's wife belongs. She is not treated cordially by the family friends. Her husband's daughter doesn't like her and this is the last straw. The climax comes when she finds that the man who wants to marry this girl is the old-time lover in her past. She bravely lays the whole business bare just as she has wanted to before Tanqueray married her. He was too weak to entertain it then and does not bear it very bravely now. In fact—well drawn and natural as the characters are—there is none of them that is worth a fiddle except the woman whom they all really despise. Yet her story is deeply interesting and truly tragic. Beautiful art has gone into the making of the picture and it is, beyond cavil, a very worthy offering, both for itself and as a picture of a noted play.

RELIANCE CHANGES FEATURE POLICY.

A new policy was recently established by the Reliance Company relative to special features, when the announcement was made that in the future the special features that have been made will be sold on a state-right proposition instead of being released through their affiliated organizations.

"The Avenging Conscience" or "Thou Shalt Not Kill," a six-reel D. W. Griffith special feaure, and "The Escape," Paul Armstrong's wonderful dramatic production, also produced in film version by Mr. Griffith, in seven reels, are the first two of these special features that will be sold in this way.

"The Worth of a Life"

CAST.

John Emerson.....Thos. Chatterton
Ruby Baker.....Gladys Brockwell
Randolph Stone.....Arthur Jarrett

THE power of conscience and of high mental training over the force of primitive inclination is admirably illustrated in "The Worth of a Life." The theme has been used before in visualization but never presented with such strength and with such intelligent attention to realistic detail. The story's power lies in a nice balance of structure, treatment and interpretation. Its form counts heavily, its handling also, and the acting is without serious blemish.

"The Worth of a Life" opens with a graduating scene at a medical college in which John Emerson is shown to be profoundly impressed by the ethics of his profession. College education, in spite of its many faults, fills the mind of an intelligent graduate with new personal and altruistic impulses. The emotions awakened on leaving the well-ordered life of Alma Mater to enter upon the perils of a professional or business career are sometimes dazzling, even distorting, but always profound. When there is a settled purpose strongly inculcated, it is apt to be felt throughout that career, even at its highest crisis. Such is the theme of "The Worth of a Life."

The theme is worked out through the intense natural love of Doctor Emerson for the girl to whom he is engaged. She is as light-hearted as a summer breeze, and as easily wafted one way or another. Now comes a New York broker, a young man whose good fortune has made him a power in the stock market, whose mental and moral training are not in keeping with his position. He wins the light-hearted one, marries her and carries her away to a life of demoralizing luxury. She finds that the sweets so alluring when held dangling beyond her reach, those that money buy, soon lose flavor when purchased, and she longs for what money cannot buy, for the love of a true heart.

The broker eventually is shot by one of his victims, and Doctor Emerson, now a great specialist, is called to save the wealthy man's life. Whatever power his natural inclinations exert is augmented by the woman who has learned to rightly value his love. She urges him to let nature take its course, to let her husband die, as he will but for the specialist's skill. The practitioner falters, but he yields to the powerful impression made at the beginning of his noble work, and saves the man intrusted to his care. The conclusion may be one of artistry—the wife goes to him without the formality of a separation from her husband—but it may be that this avoidance of the conventional will react with the average audience against the full underlying motive of the story.

"For King and Country"

Picture Playhouse Film Company Releases Story of Servian Court Intrigue in Six Parts.

Reviewed by Robert C. McElravy.

THIS is a romantic episode of the kingdom of Servia, enacted by a pleasing cast of Italian performers. The story is purely fictitious, but the settings and characterizations are such that quite an air of reality is thrown over the production. The intrigue is so carefully worked out that it seems as though it might have followed the lines of actual happenings in some far-off day.

A prologue and five reels are required for telling the film narrative. The action never rises to any great dramatic heights, yet it runs along entertainingly and has the advantage of splendid scenic effects and clear photography in maintaining the interest. The settings have all been carefully chosen and from the opening scenes, where the old king faces defeat upon the field of battle, the eye is attracted by striking environments.

Following the abdication of the old King, as pictured in the prologue, a regency is established during the youth of Sergius, the Crown Prince. Sergius goes to Paris to complete his education, whither Prince Francis and his daughter has flown, Prince Francis being dissatisfied with the policies of the Regent.

A pretty romance with Sergius and Princess Nydia as the lovers ensues and Sergius reveals his identity to the father. Even after the marriage, however, Nydia does not know of her royal alliance. This information is kept from her because the Crown Prince fears an attempt to usurp the throne before his coronation.

The first part opens with events occurring five years after the prologue. Sergius and Nydia now have a son, but the marriage is unknown in the Servian court. Princess Sonia, a court favorite, desires to sit upon the throne. She wishes to marry Sergius, but as he pays her no attentions, conspires with the Regent, William. The latter already wishes to assume the throne and Sergius is captured, while on a night visit to his wife and child, and thrown into the Grotto of St. Christopher.

Following this action Nydia comes to court to find aid in searching for Sergius. She falls a victim to the conspirators and the child is taken and thrown into prison. At this point a message cast to sea in a bottle by Sergius is found and the aid of General Candiana is obtained. After numerous adventures with Chancellor Orloff, one of the conspirators, both Prince and child are recovered and Sergius comes into the throne. The events of the final reel are spirited and pleasing.

The cast includes A. A. Capozzi as Sergius, Princess Ruspoli as Nydia and Mlle. Louise Degli Uberti as Sonia.

"One of Millions"

A Four Reel Protest Against War Picturized by J. Searle Dawley and Offered by the World Film Corporation.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

NO PICTURE made to protest against anything is likely to be a thing of beauty in itself, and this picture, "One of Millions," made by the Dyreder studio, is surely not beautiful. To its producer war is a hideous thing full of horror, hate and insanity; he has shown it as nothing else than the despoiler of all the idyllic bloom on the blossom of young love and as the render of the heart strings of maternal affection. He has made it despicable. Who can tell how such a picture will appeal to the average spectator and his family? Mere description is all that can comfortably be given to help the exhibitor make his own decision. We can say that it is well acted and that it shows a skilled hand at scene making. The photography is fair.

It opens with a little pastoral in which Laura Sawyer plays a peasant girl who is loved and married by a soldier, played by Maximilian Jurgens. These scenes are insisted on by the producer for the contrast value later when he brings on his pictures of war that soon breaks in upon the bliss of these young people. Some may think he keeps them on longer than their interest warrants.

War is declared on the wedding night and the husband has to take his gun and go. The soldier's old mother, played by Gertrude Norman, is filled with dread; but the wife, fired by thoughts of glory and ambition, bids him depart with a light heart and dreams of him coming back a captain. On the other side, we are shown the trenches and some realistic pictures of charge and retreat and rout, with the men falling and the strewn dead and the agonized faces of the wounded drawn vigorously amid the smoke and stir of battle. Then come scenes when the news of the battle reaches the cabin and later the bringing home of the dead son and husband.

In the final act, the conquering general takes possession of the cabin. The dead soldier is upstairs and the girl has gone mad. The old mother is forced to feed and wait on the general and his staff. She puts poison in the wine that the general drinks. Dying, he staggers into the room where the corpse is and dies hideously there in a chair. The crooning old witch of a woman sets the house on fire and sits waiting till they are all consumed together.

Symbolical scenes of Death and Victory, or perhaps it is Glory, open and close the offering. Between these, as they stand motionless, a flight of steps drops from a curtain, closed at the opening, and from under this a stream of blood flowing makes the letters "War" on the steps, as though splashed there.

"Perils of Pauline"

Boston Bull Pup Has Important Part in Newest Imperiled Pauline Picture.

IT MAKES no difference at all that these Pauline pictures are each of them a part of a series; for absolutely the only things that connect them are the name they sail under and the fact that the characters in all are—Pauline (Pearl White), Harry (Crane Wilbur), Owen (Paul Panzer) and the gypsy leader (Clifford Bruce) who helps Owen, with such others as may be demanded by the exigencies of each new tale that Charles Goddard evolves and Donald Mackensie the director of them picturizes. The wonderful thing is the fertility of the author. They are well staged pictures, too, with backgrounds and scenes discovered or contrived that are absolutely what are wanted. In this one Pauline is lured to a ruined house where a gang of counterfeiters have nested and in which they have installed sliding doors with levers attached so that they will be safely hidden. An old church serves perfectly as this building with its scarey looking cellar stairs and rickety doors and windows.

When the gang got the girl there it made the mistake of letting the bull pup slip (a good bit of business), for it scampered up to the ground floor and out the window. Harry is soon on the job and after a quick turn of affairs, he and Pauline are fleeing for their lives in an auto which breaks down. A rustic log cabin is at hand. In this they take refuge and finding there rifle and revolver, provide the excitement of a cabin attacked and defended as in Indian pictures. It is elemental and when well handled as here is always stirring. The picture is as good an offering as any of the series have been and is perhaps better than most of them. It has some very good moments and runs as convincingly and smoothly as any. It is a very good melodrama; will surely be liked.

"PAULINE" ENDS WITH 20TH EPISODE.

In response to many requests received by the Eclectic Flm Company as to the probable duration of "The Perils of Pauline," public announcement is made that the big serial will be completed with the 20th episode. As the 17th episode will soon be released this means that there will be but three more made.

Elsie Janis with Bosworth.

MISS ELSIE JANIS, considered to be the hit of Europe and America, has just given her consent to act before the screen for the first time in her life, having signed a contract with Bosworth, Inc., of Los Angeles, to make at least two pictures immediately for the screen.

She says: "I hesitated considerably to take up acting before the screen. I presume I have a little antipathy to it, similar to that experienced by every artist of note, who feels perhaps that it is a little bit beneath his or her dignity; but the character of the artists comprising the staff of Bosworth, Inc., helped, together with Frank A. Garbutt's charming personality, to win me over to the idea, and now that I at last have given my consent, I am enthusiastic and anxious for the work to begin."

Elsie Janis.

Miss Janis left for Los Angeles on the Broadway Limited Sunday evening, November 1, to be gone several weeeks; although her appearance on the screen for Bosworth will not interfere with any of her legitimate stage duties.

Mr. Garbutt, during his recent visit to New York, also signed up with James K. Hackett, who will appear in one of his popular successes; Dustin Farnum, who will probably play in "Captain Courtesy" and "Texas"; George Fawcett, who will probably appear in "The Great John Ganton," and Maclyn Arbuckle, who will appear in two photo plays—one to be a reproduction of one of his most popular successes, the other to be staged from an original scenario written by himself. In fact, it is not impossible that many of the Bosworth productions in the near future will be original scenarios by these most original stars and writers.

Miss Janis herself is going to write a scenario in which she is to star. It is well known to many of Miss Janis' most ardent admirers that she has written the scenarios of many of her most popular successes, although they have not in all instances been credited to her.

EMMETT DALTON IN NEW YORK.

EMMETT DALTON, the surviving member of the Dalton boys, is at present in New York City. He is accompanied by Mrs. Dalton. Mr. Dalton brought with him the three-reel picture which he produced six years ago, in which are shown incidents in the career of the bandit brothers. The oldest Dalton brother was killed while, as a United States marshal, he was making an arrest. This event preceded the outlawry.

In a conversation with a World man to whom he had just shown his pictures, Mr. Dalton said that he always delivers a prefatory talk in which he points out the evils following from a life of outlawry, especially advising the younger men against bad companions. He called attention to the fact that in the film there is nothing tending to make a hero of any of those without the law, that while the pictures show how it was that the Dalton boys took up the life of outlaws—following their being defrauded out of eighteen months' salary by an absconding United States Marshal—there is also shown the death by shooting that came to all but one of the men who held up the two banks at Coffeyville, Kan., in 1892, and the imprisonment for life meted out to the survivor.

Emmett Dalton was pardoned after serving fourteen and a half years. He is now forty-four years old. His appearance is that of a substantial business man, without a trace in manner or bearing of the characteristics usually ascribed to bad men. In fact, he seems to be all that such a man is not. Mr. Dalton has a fund of reminiscence, in the telling of which he emphasizes the axiom that "the way of the transgressor is hard," and the way of the bandit especially so.

"The Man from Mexico"

John Barrymore Scores Heavily in Five-Part Famous Players' Adaptation of Well-Known Comedy.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

WHEN John Barrymore made his screen debut in "The American Citizen" we knew there had been uncovered a man with unusual aptitude for the silent drama, or still better and rarer, silent comedy. "Silent," by the way, when speaking of "The Man from Mexico," refers not to an audience if one may judge by the reception given at the Strand Monday afternoon to the Famous Players' five-part adaptation of Du Souchet's comedy. While the house was not boisterous, there were continual ripples of mirth. The fun is generously sprinkled through the entire length.

The story is straight comedy. It supplies Mr. Barrymore with a splendid medium for the display of his bright particular talent in getting out of a given humorous situation the most there may be in it. There are many twists to the plot; there are complications and then more complications. If it strain the credulity, this remarkable series of happenings that befall Mr. and Mrs. Fitzhew, nevertheless, it furnishes abundant fun. And that is more than sufficient answer.

There need be no question about atmosphere. Producer Heffron has taken his large company over to Blackwells Island, where, with grim, gray walls for a background, he has shown his hero among other reluctant endeavors "making little ones out of big ones." Wellington Playter, as the prison guard who sticks so closely to Fitzhew, gives a good performance. So, too, does Fred Annerly, as Louis, the waiter who is arrested in the raid on the Cleopatra Cafe at the time Mrs. Fitzhew and the district attorney's assistant are searching for the gay Fitzhew. Anton Ascher makes a good Schmidt, the cabby who refuses to convey Fitzhew to the Jersey woods to watch the "shunrise," and gets beaten up and sent to jail along with his bibulous, magistrate-defying fare. Harold Lockwood has the quiet role as the successful suitor for the hand of Mrs. Fitzhew's sister. Pauline Neff, as Mrs. Fitzhew, entered into the spirit of the piece. Two other players deserve mention—Majors, the friend of Fitzhew, and the aid to the district attorney.

The scenes in the cafe are finely presented; others that stand out are the interiors of the institution on the Island, where Fitzhew misleads the waiter into starting a riot that he may pose as saving the day; where Mrs. Fitzhew pays a benevolent visit and nearly collides with the husband she supposes to be in Mexico. The denouement, at the dinner in celebration of the traveler's return is noteworthy. The script is by Miss Unsell, of the company's staff, and is a smooth piece of work. With the amplification afforded by Mr. Barrymore's "business" and the support of a competent, well-directed cast "The Man from Mexico" is a "go."

WAR REFUGEES IN "ZUDORA."

Peaceful New Rochelle saw war refugees pack their prized belongings through its streets last week. An East Indian caravan, princes, potentates, dancers, horsemen, carrying with them all the panoply, typical of the Oriental's love of display, it was. Down to Thanhouser Park swarmed the mighty army and there a halt was made. The foreigners arrived ten days ago from their country where their homes had been pillaged and their villages burned by the fiercely marauding Turk.

They fled to the coast bringing with them the swords, guns, rugs, vases, et cetra which had prominent place in their now ruined homes for years, perhaps centuries, for from father to son are the family weapons handed down; as the smiling daughters of that sunkissed land receive the laces, the handiwork of their mothers. Now will they be seen in motion pictures—in "Zudora," Thanhouser's wonderful photoplay serial, which has its first release on Nov. 23.

KLEINE TO RELEASE "MME. DU BARRY."

George Kleine announces the early release of "Mme. Du Barry," featuring Mrs. Leslie Carter in the title role. "Mme. Du Barry" is one of the most beautiful subjects ever put into film. In addition to the splendid work of Mrs. Carter, the picture is characterized by a lavishness of production and an attention to detail commensurate with its long and successful stage history. King Louis XV. of France is played by Richard Thornton; DeCosse Brissac, Captain of the Guards, by Hamilton Revelle, while Campbell Gollan handles the difficult role of Comte Jean Du Barry. This is the same cast which presented "Du Barry" throughout America so many times.

"The Opened Shutters"

Charming Four-Reel Production of Mrs. Burnham's Novel.

Released by Universal Company.

IT IS seldom that a screen production enters so completely into the spirit and flavor of a novel as has happened in this four-reel adaptation of one of Mrs. Clara Louise Burnham's books. The members of the Gold Seal company appearing in this offering have brought out the characteristic charm of this popular woman writer. There is the usual attractive New England settings, the hard-headed New England characters, the light, pleasing love story and final happiness on all sides after the misunderstandings have passed.

Scene from "The Opened Shutters" (Gold Seal).

This is one of Mrs. Burnham's best known stories and has a decided psychological trend. "Thinkright" Johnson is the character upon which chief interest centers. This fine old country gentleman is a firm believer in the doctrine of right thinking. He applies the theory to the rebellious heroine in a way that brings out her character in an appealing way. The story is not one of intense, dramatic interest; it is rather a slow-moving, thoughtful presentation, calculated to bring out the best emotions in the observer. It succeeds fully in its mission and should prove of wide appeal. The cast seems fitted to the story and the photography and settings are particularly attractive.

The development of this story furnishes abundant proof that a screen production does not have to be all punch and action to hold the interest.

The very competent cast includes Wm. Worthington as Thinkright, Anna Little, Herbert Rawlinson, Frank Lloyd, Betty Schade and Cora Drew. Otis Turner was the director.

A SKILLFULLY blended appeal to those who enjoy the adventures of a criminal, and a bigger appeal to those who are sick to death of weary repetition, "The Turning of the Road," in spite of its "Thes" in its title, will form an attractive addition to any varied program. Although its climax depends upon a sudden conversion of character, ample preparation justifies the change, if, indeed, we may not always expect a woman to do the right thing when she is not forced by overpowering circumstances to enter upon a career of crime. Bill Kent, stepfather of Dora Fletcher, in this case, supplies the dominating element. He drives his stepdaughter into committing acts revolting to her better nature. She is weak enough to yield while unsupported, but a turning of the road restores her normal balance.

Young Sidney Burdett and his bride create a sensation at Sea View—at least she does by her gowns and jewels. Important guests at the same hotel is Rev. Edgar Raymond. Now comes Bill Kent, "member of a band of international crooks," and his daughter, for no other purpose than that of stealing the jewels. As members of an international gang there is nothing particularly subtle in their arrangements. They simply hang about until a favorable opportunity arrives. Meanwhile, the young clergyman becomes impressed by the character of Della and interests her to such a degree that she falters when the time comes for her to act. Rev. Edgar, all unconsciously, exerts a tremendous influence for the good upon Della, while her stepfather plays upon her fears. The latter succeeds in forcing her to abstract the jewels from a hotel room during the bride's absence, but the young thief becomes terrorized and hides in the clergyman's room. To avoid being "caught with the goods," she puts them in his satchel for temporary safe keeping. She is forced to hide behind a screen when he enters and sees him carry off the satchel—he is about to visit his invalid mother at her cottage.

Now follows a chase. The clergyman reaches his mother's home before Kent and Della can overtake him. Della obtains admission to the house by a ruse and is foiled by mere chance in her attempt to get possession of the valise. Meanwhile, the influence of a refined home, combined with that of the clergyman's invalid mother works upon the girl's sensibilities until she breaks down and confesses all. From this turn in the road she is very gently led to an appreciation of what is due the world from her as a woman. After Kent's capture and restoration of the jewels, the turn also leads to Della's complete happiness.

Colin Campbell, veteran director of the Selig Polyscope Company, who produced "The Spoilers," passes along much valuable advice to writers in The Script, which is the official organ of the Photoplay Authors' League, in an article entitled, "Greater Needs in Photoplays."

"The Test of Manhood"

Three-Reel Balboa Picture Full of Tense Action Offered by Box Office Attractions.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

TWO qualities are pre-eminent in pictures made by the Balboa studio—the gripping action in scenes as real as the heart's pulse and beautiful photography. We are likely to find sea scenes and these are apt to be set on a rocky shore with boulders photographed with an almost gem-like brilliancy. There is, too, in these offerings usually an interesting, popular story which is more apt to satisfy the spectator's human sympathies, his heart, than the colder faculties, his head, which demands unattainable perfection of form. Balboa pictures are democratic in the motivation of the characters, the problems that they encounter and in clearly defined melodramatic morals. We seldom find in them the aristocratic detachment of the picture's maker from the motions of his work. This is one reason why Balboa offerings have attained so wide a popularity.

In this picture, "The Test of Manhood," the story is perhaps even better than usual. It is full of adventures on land and sea and its melodramatic plot includes incidents that have the marvelous realistic grip that suggests Jack London at his best. There are many sharply contrasted characters in it and this always adds greatly to a picture's interest. The test of manhood is applied to the son of a rich rancher. He at first drinks and wastes his money gambling and his father orders him off the ranch till he has proved himself a man. He becomes a sailor—there's a fisticuff mutiny on board that ship that could hardly have been more vigorous if the picture's camera had caught real life for it. Meanwhile things are not going well at the ranch. A clever shyster lawyer is scheming to get the property from the old man who, in need of money, has given him a mortgage. Two characters are helping the shyster, a villainous foreman and a gambler who would like to be "on the square," but who, on account of past performances, is in the shyster's power. This gambler has a sister to whom the shyster has taken a fancy. Things are drawing to a head around the ranch when the son, escaping from the brutal ship-master, comes home with two of his companions. The gambler to save his sister allies himself with the son to confound the shyster and they rescue both the girl and the property, in a lively dramatic last act.

MCCARDELL WINS ANOTHER PRIZE.

Roy L. McCardell, the humorist, is richer to-day by $250 through winning the prize offered by David Horsley, the veteran motion picture manufacturer, to the person suggesting the best name for the new brand of comedies which Mr. Horsley is producing at his big Centaur studios at Bayonne, N. J. Mr. McCardell suggested the name "Mina," the component letters of which stand for "Made In America." More than 800 suggestions were received, a preponderance of which came from exhibitors, but the list included prominent people in every department of the motion picture industry, and such literary lights as Harold McGrath, the author, and Frederick Chapin, the playwright.

This is the second prize which Mr. McCardell has won in the motion picture business in a short time. Two weeks ago he received the first prize, $1,000 in the comedy scenario contest conducted by the Chartered Theatres Corporation.

BANGS LABORATORIES IN BANKRUPTCY.

The Bangs Laboratories, Inc., is in the hands of a receiver following the institution of bankruptcy proceedings against the corporation in the United States District Court. Judge Learned Hand appointed Wilmot T. Cox, an attorney of 34 Pine Street, receiver of the property under a bond of $5,000 with instructions to assemble the details of the failure and present the facts before the general creditors.

The liabilities of the film company are estimated at $17,000 and the assets which consist principally of machinery for manufacturing films is valued at $11,000, but it is considered doubtful if this sum can be realized on the property. However, it is expected that the corporation will endeavor to effect a satisfactory settlement with the creditors and continue business.

The petition was filed by Avery F. Cushman, an attorney, representing the following creditors: James G. Payne, $1,441; Robert F. Ludwig, $390, and William S. Jennings, $55.

The corporation operates a laboratory at 69 West Ninetieth street and maintains executive offices at 39 West Thirty-second Street. Louis B. Jennings is president of the corporation and Frank C. Bangs is treasurer.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

NEFF MAKES A STATEMENT.

Inside Facts Pertaining to Resolutions Sent to the Press By Cleveland Local No. 1.

AT the Columbus Convention of the Ohio State League, held at the Southern Hotel on the 15th and 16th of September, a motion was made that a committee of three be appointed to consult with any one who could and would furnish sufficient capital to start a paper exclusively for exhibitors. Cleveland had several delegates present and not one of them voted against the motion and the records show that the motion passed unanimously. The committee appointed by the president were Ed. Kohl, Cleveland, Ohio, Local No. 1; Harry Vestal, Ada, Ohio, who belongs direct to the State; J. Q. Alexander, Dayton, Ohio, Local No. 5. This committee was instructed to endorse a paper when they were satisfied that those desiring to establish a paper had sufficient capital and would conduct the paper along lines beneficial to the exhibitor.

The committee was asked permission to start a paper and granted the request. The stock is owned by bonafide motion picture exhibitors and members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League and anyone who is a member of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America can buy stock at $10 a share as long as there is any stock left to be sold. When some of the members of Cleveland Local No. 1 begin to see that the men behind the paper meant business, as usual they opposed it.

The following brief history of Cleveland Local No. 1 will show that this Local has been opposed to about everything that the rest of the State of Ohio has been in favor of:

The men who started Cleveland Local are C. M. Christenson, F. M. Kenney, assisted by Geo. M. Westley, President Neff's representative. The first act of Cleveland Local No. 1 was to start a fight with Keith's Hippodrome; the Local failed to make good and lost the fight. Second: The Local attended the Dayton Convention in 1912 and offered a resolution to amend the Constitution so they would have to pay only 10 cents a month instead of 25 cents to support the State League. They offered another resolution asking the State to pay part or all of the indebtedness they had incurred in fighting the Keith Hippodrome. Both resolutions were defeated by a big majority. The Cleveland Local instigated the local censor board; it was a failure and was wiped out of existence when the State Censor Board went into effect.

The next move Cleveland Local made was, at the Columbus Convention, to vote and instruct the State President to secure a Censor Law and there was only one vote against these instructions and that vote was C. M. Christenson of Cleveland, Ohio. After the Censor Board was working, Local No. 1 in conjunction with a New York Newspaper tried to secure a referendum vote against this law. Another failure.

At the bolt at New York City, the only man who attended the bolters convention was a member of Cleveland Local who worked through the resolution to endorse the National Censor Board. All of the members of Cleveland Local withdrew from Local No. 1 with the exception of twelve. They had quite a sum of money in the treasury and it was checked out to their stenographer and the manipulations were such that if the State had made an effort to have an accounting it would have been impossible. They made a failure of their Association Local and all came back into the old Local No. 1, but they would come back without paying any dues which the State has refused and there are only Fourteen (14) members in good standing in Cleveland Local at this date and they are the old reliable League members who never bolted. Cleveland Local has never paid any attention to the constitution and by-laws and has tried to lower the State dues and has tried to get the State to pay its debts. It is the only local in the State of Ohio that has tried any of these tactics. They claim now a large membership, but the books of the President, Secretary and Treasurer shows only fourteen (14) members in good standing and ten (10) of these members are in favor of disbanding the local entirely and joining the State direct, as they are disgusted with the cheap and arbitrary methods used by the local.

JOPLIN GETS CENSORSHIP ORDINANCE.

Charged With Showing Immoral Pictures, Exhibitors Co-operate With City Officials In Passing Censorship Legislation.

AN ordinance providing for the censoring of films, the first law of the kind Joplin, Mo., has had, went into effect November 1. Joplin has had no censorship of pictures, and during a recent period of charges that immoral pictures were being shown, many of the managers consulted and co-operated with the city officials in the effort to establish a standard as to what should be shown, and to arrive at a convenient mode of inaugurating censorship. The ordinance is largely the result of these conferences and co-operation.

Censorship of films is under the new law the province of the chief of police or some person or persons named by him. Films that have not been censored by an approved board must be examined and passed by the chief of police or his agent before being shown in Joplin, and a fee of fifty cents is to be charged. The chief has the right, however, to waive examination of historical, educational or religious pictures, or any picture that shows local views or views of travel. If a censored picture is shown, without the eliminations ordered having been made, the agent or exhibitor is subject to a fine of from $10 to $300.

Every exhibitor must present to the chief at least three days before it is to be shown, the title and trade name of the film, the name of the producing company, and a statement as to what board of censorship has passed upon it, if any. The National Board of Censorship is named as an approved board, and the mayor may name others. Films approved by such boards will not be examined by the chief of police before being exhibited, but he has the authority to order eliminations even from them, either before or after their public exhibition. Permits given by the chief to films examined and passed by him must be displayed on the reel or on a slide, or be conspicuously posted at the entrance of the theater.

The law applies to all exhibitions of moving pictures whether an admission fee is charged or not; and all owners or agents of moving picture premises are interdicted from showing or allowing to be shown obscene, lewd, indecent or immoral moving pictures that would have a harmful influence on the public.

The city council is given the right to revoke the license of any motion picture concern upon a hearing after two days' notice. Recourse against alleged injustice by the chief of police in his censorship is by appeal to the mayor, whose opinion is final.

EXHIBITORS' MEETING AT HARRISBURG.

Notice to Pennsylvania exhibitors has been sent out by H. C. Kleim of the convention committee of the Exhibitors of Western Pennsylvania, to the effect that there will be a convention at Harrisburg on November 11 to 15 inclusive. For further information address the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, 113 Fourth avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa.

MRS. FAHRNEY CENTAUR EDITOR.

Mrs. Milton H. Fahrney is now active head of the scenario department of David Horsley's Centaur plant in Bayonne, N. J. For six years she and her husband have been in the employ of Mr. Horsley. Most of this time has been spent on the Pacific Coast at Mr. Horsley's Los Angeles studios. There Mrs. Fahrney prepared the scripts from which more than 200 successful photoplays have been produced, a high average when it is remembered that many of the scenarios called for plural reel features.

"Life's Shop Window."

Box Office Attractions Company.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

WHATEVER may be said against the reputation of the book published under the above title, nothing whatever can be said against the motion picture bearing that name. Not even the sternest of moralists can find anything objectionable in the picture. Indeed, I would be doing the director of "Life's Shop Window" but poor justice if I were to content myself with this naked negative praise. The exhibitor is entitled to know that here is a picture which, in spite of obvious faults in dramatic construction and in spite of its occasional poor photography, deserves to rank among the first-class in the production of features.

In spite of the unbelievably poor way in which the picture was presented in the Academy of Music—the musical accompaniment consisting of a low montonous wail at times verging on the discordant—the inherent quality told and the effect on the audience was profound.

It is to be much deplored that the distributors of this excellent feature were not satisfied to make their appeal to the public upon the sheer merits of the production. They have, for mysterious reasons, called in the surreptitious aids of what must be described as false advertising and misleading posters. In fact, they seek to create the impression that the strong under-current of sensuousness which characterizes the book has found its way to the screen and, of course, the assumption is that the screen will intensify whatever the printed page contains. Having a clean picture they are not ashamed to make an appeal to the lovers of the morbid and the salacious. Probably this is good showmanship; to this average understanding it seems quite beyond comprehension.

The first part of the picture is of singular beauty and sweetness. A young Englishman is boarding at a farm in rural England. He wants to prepare himself for taking charge of a big ranch in the far west of America. He takes no notice of the daughter of the house, an insipid creature, but is much attracted by a servant, a young girl just budding into womanhood. The girl, shy and cowed by hard taskmasters, has a natural grace and refinement which appeals to the prospective farmer. Like most girls of her age she has visions of a world of sweetness and pleasure in which she is to be the queen. Her imagination paints the hero who is to share this realm of dreamed happiness with her. It is the story of Cinderella over again, only the touches here are strikingly artistic. How the girl's soul and fancy remained free and full of life amid the wretched drudgery to which Fate had condemned her is painted out on the screen with a most charming and delicate skill. The Prince Charming who now enters into her life is as manly and as honorable as the fancied hero of the fairy tale. It is here that the story falls in with the ideals of convention. No Tristan and Isolde, no Abelard and Heloise, no Francesca da Rimini are offered up for our admiration. The unfolding of the woman's heart and the ardent love of the man end with simple marriage in a very pretty and appropriate English country church. The atmosphere all through the courtship of the man and the girl breathes alternate sweetness and sublime pathos. It must be noted here that the acting, both of the man and the girl, are together with intelligent direction and lovely scenery, responsible for this success. The appearance of the wooer and the wooed are most pleasing, their manner most natural, tender and refined. If the language on the titles is taken from the novel, and I believe it is, one can hardly imagine that the writer had any but a clean mind. Such titles are seldom seen on a screen; for splendor of diction and high poetic quality they rank high, indeed. I am sorry to say that at times they have been mutilated and distorted by poor editing.

Shortly after the marriage—to resume the brief outline of the story—the husband is forced to come to America by the stress of business. As he is going to a wild and unsettled country he acts upon the advice of his friend in America and decides to go without his wife. The latter, in the course of time, becomes a mother and though the wedding ring and the marriage certificate are displayed before the farmer's termagant wife the young mother is driven from the farm. With her baby she starts for America and is reunited to her husband. The picture of domestic happiness which follows is drawn with the consummate kill of a master. The incidents in which the Indian and the Indian girl figure lend much color to the story and heighten the element of romance which abounds all through the feature. A young man who had helped the wife with her luggage in England as a member of a hunting party is thrown from a horse and injured right near the farm of the husband. There is recognition between the guest and the wife. The latter lives but for her husband and her child, despite the unintentional neglect of the husband, who is engrossed with the management of his ranch. The guest turns out to be a rogue, he abuses the hospitality of the ranch by making love to the wife and playing on her sense of loneliness. He has seen the whole world and has lived through many adventures. The wife falls under his spell; she does not love him, but finds him interesting "for the dangers he passed through" and at last yields to his importunities to run away. Here the development of the story gets out of the director's hands and there are many crudities which make it difficult to follow the events. The essence of it all, however, is the reawakening of the maternal instinct in the tempted wife and her return to her allegiance. The fate of the villain is left in doubt, but we are permitted to infer that the old Indian dispatched him.

"The Chocolate Soldier."

The Daisy Feature Film Company. Five Parts.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS feature is a filmed version of the well-known musical comedy. It carries the original cast, which on the speaking stage was admittedly a good one. It is possible to take a musical comedy and put it on the films with little or no loss of those particular things which goes to make up the success of a musical comedy.

Fun, music, dialogue and color in dress and costume have much to do with the success of a musical comedy; the plot need not be a marvel of dramatic construction or of startling originality. Music of course cannot be filmed. An attempt may be made to fit parts of the original score to the filmed edition, but this is rarely satisfactory. Dialogue can only be filmed in titles and this of course is more or less of a makeshift. Black and white photography cannot do full justice to costumes.

There remains but one ingredient which is eminently filmable—fun. That there is much fun in the musical comedy "The Chocolate Soldier" is very true, but scarcely enough to furnish forth five thousand feet of film. What fun has reached the screen is mostly beaten thin and therefore of scant value to the exhibitor. Fun on the screen must give and vibrate and bubble if not all the time, at least, a great part of the time. Song and music will make a little fun go a long way, but on the screen we need the kind of fun which will go without these aids.

The personality of the artists engaged in this production is most pleasing to the eye. Their historic talents are obvious, their lack of experience before the camera is equally obvious. They hold the screen too cheap who think that the art of expression before the camera is acquired without hard experience.

Some, I ought to say most, of the exterior settings are very beautiful, which makes the few bad ones all the more conspicuous. Of the interior settings, which in such a production must be considered important, it is difficult to speak with patience. They are in the worst possible "early bad form" of the industry. I have seen nothing quite as bad since 1906. Here and there the photography is good, but in many scenes it is incredibly bad. The same I am sorry to say must be predicated of the double exposure work. It was technically poor and there was evident carelessness in posing the figures. The audience at the private showing in Weber's Theatre consisted of specially invited guests, lavish in their applause, but even they laughed but seldom at what was doing on the screen.

CONTINENTAL BOOKING KEYSTONE SPECIALS.

Sydney E. Abel, manager of the Continental Feature Film Company, 420 Penn avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., announced on Saturday, October 17, that he would institute a new method of renting first-run, two-part Keystone comedies, released every fortnight and marketed through the Continental Company. This proclamation tickled the curiosity of a large number of Pittsburgh exhibitors and they advanced to the office of the Continental Company in crowds, and to each exhibitor who came to get further information the manager of the feature film company gave him to understand that the service could be given to but one exhibitor for the first showing. After the exhibitors interested had obtained a clear idea of the new method of renting the first-run showing of the Keystone comedies and being cognizant of the big business power behind this brand of laugh-producer, the manager of the Continental Company, after considering all kinds of bids, finally closed with Isaac Guckenheimer, owner of the Cameraphone theater, Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, at $50 a day for a two-reel comedy featuring Charles Chaplin and Mabel Norman, entitled "Dought and Dynamite," the Keystone release for Monday, October 26, which was the first picture to be sent out by the Continental under its new way of distribution.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"THE MEANS AND THE END" (Essanay).

"The Means and the End" is a strong drama of the struggle between capital and labor. William D. Hildebrand, a trust magnate and capitalist, though not naturally a tyrant, has been so engrossed in his schemes to make money and build up great enterprises that he oppresses the people.

Vincent Archer, a Sociological worker, learns from his uncle on his death bed that he and Hildebrand were responsible for the death of a man. He uses this means to gain his end of building a model tenement house district for the poor. He forces Hildebrand, on the threat of exposure, to give the money while he and his secretary puts the schemes through.

Hildebrand's daughter, Helene, becomes immensely interested in the work and finally falls in love with Archer. Hildebrand, himself, after he has got into the enterprise, becomes interested and experiences a change of heart.

But another man knows of the slaying, a Jim Parker, of the underworld. He threatens to expose Hildebrand. Archer goes to Parker and while he is recovering from a spree, takes the evidence away from him and burns it up.

Parker goes to his office and almost kills Archer in a terrific battle. Helene takes Archer flowers while he is recovering and visits him frequently. While he is in love with her, yet he does not propose, because their stations in life are so far apart.

Archer comes to the conclusion that he was not justified in forcing money from Hildebrand, even for a good cause. He writes him to this effect and says he is going to leave the city.

But Helene hearing that he is going away, goes to him and asks him frankly if he does not care for her. This breaks down the barrier and he tells her he loves her more than anything else in life. Hildebrand then tells Archer the circumstances of the killing, which was in self-defense.

This production is booked for release November 20.

NEW THEATER FOR ASHLAND.

Latts, Latts & Schwager, who comprise the Royal Theater Company, of Ashland, Wis., recently opened the Royal Theater in that city. It is a thoroughly fireproof structure, and is up to date in all its conveniences and appointments. The house has a seating capacity of 876 and plays moving pictures and vaudeville, with an occasional road show. A Mirroroide screen is the projection surface, which, according to reports, is giving entire satisfaction. Five or six reels will be projected at each show. The admission prices are 10 and 15 cents for adults and 5 cents for children.

LUBIN PLAYERS AT HARTFORD COLLEGE.

Recently, a Lubin company availed themselves of a permit to take some scenes of George Ade's comedy "The College Widow," at the conservative college of Haverford. As soon as the troupe took possession of the campus there was no more work to be done in the school, the boys taking advantage of the usual permit to now and then lose a day.

Forty-five actors and actresses under the direction of Barry O'Neil were in the troupe. Ethel Clayton took the part of the "Widow" herself and Mrs. Morris was her "Chaperone." The chaperone, by the way, is called upon to kiss a college freshman (screen variety), in the scenario. Whenever this occurred a large gallery of Haverford students applauded vociferously, shouting "we want chaperones right away." Quaint old Founder's Hall, Barclay Hall, Lloyd Hall and other buildings of the college were included in some of the scenes.

The Mrs. Morris mentioned above is a society lady of the town and her appearance as the chaperon has caused quite a flutter in the exclusive set.

ROBERT H. COCHRANE, JR., COMES TO TOWN.

Robert H. Cochrane, secretary and treasurer of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, has enjoyed for some time sole possession of the name "Robert H.," but the latest authorized report is that he has a rival for that distinction. Robert H. Cochrane, Jr., is the name of the party of the second part, and it is said that he is roundfaced and handsome. Robert H., Jr., came to town October 10, bringing with him a world of happiness for the parents and hearty congratulations from a host of friends. Along with its ability to report "mother and child doing fine," the Moving Picture World offers its congratulations to Mr. and Mrs. Cochrane.

"LORD CECIL PLAYS A PART" (Lubin).

Again the Beloved Adventurer undertakes to straighten out the troubles of a worthy couple and although the game is a dangerous one he is eminently successful. On the ship that is bringing him back to England he encounters a bridal couple just returning from their honeymoon. The young husband gets into the clutches of a pair of poker crooks and is not only cleaned out of his money, but also $10,000 belonging to his employer. The situation is so desperate that the heartbroken bride is about to jump overboard when Cecil saves her and hears the story. He calms the little girl down and promises that all shall be well. Crooks are favorite "game" for the Englishman and he not only gets all of the money back, but makes them feel that they have encountered a cyclone. Thus the newlyweds are made happy and Cecil adds one more number to his list of Adventures. Arthur Johnson's forceful acting in this photoplay is pretty dramatic and will again make him the talk of the Fans.

"THE MAN FROM HOME" (Lasky).

"The man From Home" the famous Leibler Company Astor Theatre success which comes to the Strand Theatre next week, is the most recent output of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company and has at the head of the cast Charles Richman the recent star in "Help Wanted" at the Maxine Elliott Theatre. As a play, "The Man From Home" enjoyed the record run of the season and on tour, enjoyed the maximum of popularity.

In the photo play, the Lasky Company spared neither pains nor expense to make the production even more massive and finished than the stage production and in addition to Mr. Richman, the cast contains James Neill, Theodore Roberts, J. W. Johnston and a new find of the Lasky directors, Florence Dagmar who plays one of the principal roles. "The Man From Home" was released November 9 and will have its first showing in New York at the Strand Theatre.

"THE COUNTRY MOUSE" (Bosworth).

An announcement of special interest concerns the latest Bosworth release, "The Country Mouse." In this sparkling comedy of social and political life in a state capital, Miss Adele Farrington makes her first appearance in pictures, after a highly successful career in musical comedy. Miss Farrington possesses to an unusual degree the art of rousing sympathy for the character she is portraying as well as making the utmost of the humor of the situation. In "The Country Mouse" she plays the title role, a dowdy little countrywoman, who finds herself called upon to cope with the clever leaders of the political and social life in a state capital. Her interpretation is extraordinarily fine and sympathetic. Hobart Bosworth, who wrote the play, is cast to splendid advantage as the farmer politician, in which role he gives new proof of his versatility and genius. Myrtle Stedman and Marshall Stedman are seen to great advantage. Rhea Haines, another great favorite in the Bosworth company, contributes a striking character study. The story is a sparkling comedy of the experiences of a countryman and his wife in political life. Beautiful settings and fine photography add much to the success of the production. This subject will be released November 23.

"THE PRINCE PARTY" (Essanay).

"The Prince Party," released by Essanay Nov. 13, is a truly American story of a certain class of newly rich, in which a wealthy couple seeks to marry off at least one of their three daughters to a man of royal birth. The two eldest daughters fall into their parents' plans with a will, but the youngest and most beautiful, with real American spirit, vows that she will wed no one with whom she is not in love.

The part of the prince, the gentlemanly vagabond, is unusually well portrayed by Mr. Bushman, and Miss Bayne enacts the role of Betty, with the true feeling of an independent American girl.

Edward Mackey

EDWARD MACKEY, who is just finishing "The Span of Life" for the Kinetophote Corporation, has had a rather rapid rise to the position of general director, which he now holds in the Kinetophote studios. Mr. Mackey entered the motion picture field only last January, having come from a long experience on the dramatic stage.

When he went with the Kinetophote forces he was engaged for a rather important part in one of the first big productions gotten out by that company. In that feature he worked under the direction of Frederick Thomson. Later, he appeared in "The Little Jewess" and still later became director of the company, himself, making as his first picture, "The Coming Power," in which Lionel Adams, Edith Luckett, William Crimmins and Anna Rose had the leading roles. Comment of a commendatory character has been heard for "The Coming Power." A large number of exhibitors have booked the picture on the pure merit of the way in which the scenes had been handled.

Edward Mackey.

Mr. Mackey is now directing "The Span of Life," which has been picturized for the Kinetophote by Catherine Carr from the late Sutton Vane's melodrama of the same name. Lionel Barrymore is being featured in the film as well as Gladys Wynne, Lyster Chambers and others. This film is about finished and will be among the November releases of the Kinetophote.

Before Mr. Mackey went to the Kinetophote he played for the Famous Players, taking the feature part in "Clothes" put on by that company. Previous to that his activities on the stage were varied and covered a long time.

Mr. Mackey says that he likes the motion picture field and intends to stay in it if his talents continue to find him such employment. He enjoys the out-of-doors activity which the film game affords and finds himself in much better health there than in regular stage work.

THOMAS COMMERFORD IN MASTERFUL PORTRAYAL.

Thomas Commerford plays the part of the aged father of the selfish and willful woman who gives up her sweetheart because of his parent's disgrace in the Essanay moral play "Whatsoever a Woman Soweth" in masterful style. He portrays the emotions of the kindly and benevolent old man, shocked at his daughter's callousness and yet longing for her happiness, with an exactness that makes all his expressions clear cut and vivid on the screen.

Warner's to Inaugurate New Service.

Beginning Sunday, November 8, the United Motion Picture Producers, Inc., Will Release Output.

THE United Film Service will inaugurate its program on Sunday, November 8. This service constitutes the new program of Warner's Features, Inc., the productions being supplied by the manufacturing companies contributing to Warner's and which are now combined under the name of United Motion Pictures Producers, Inc. The Warner Company has been preparing for months for the opening of this program. Especial attention has been given to securing a variety of subjects as well as quality in production. Many finished subjects are already in hand, and the producers are actively at work on future releases.

The first pictures to be issued include comedies, semi-comedies, dramas and westerns. Much thought has been devoted to the making of single-reel subjects, and the officers of the company believe they have succeeded in obtaining results out of the ordinary, that they have uncovered a number of unique ideas that will prove refreshing to picture-goers.

As representative of what may be expected in the future from the United Film Service the following are cited at random from the initial releases:

"Prince Charlie," a Superba comedy in which an Irish laborer goes to sea, gets shipwrecked on a cannibal island, and marries the queen of the tribe. Charles De Forrest is the real comedian who takes the part of the Irishman, and he has a reputation for doing that sort of work particularly well.

"The Gypsy's Warning," a Premier drama, showing unusual effects in story and setting.

"Reuben's Busy Day," an Albuquerque comedy-drama picturing remarkable stunts with an automobile. Buck Connors and Winna Brown are the leads.

"The Villain Still Pursued Her," a Starlight comedy full of most entertaining novelty trick work.

Scene from "The Gypsy's Warning" (Warner).

Scene from "Reuben's Busy Day" (Warner).

In order to keep up the work of reviewing the films as they come in it has been found necessary to install a double screen and another machine in the Warner's projecting room.

ZOE THEATER OPENED WITH PRAISE.

The Zoe theater in Houston, Texas, one of the best and latest picture theaters to be opened in that city, was the occasion of many commendatory comments on its first day of existence. Mayor Ben Campbell, of Houston, said that the opening of such a splendid house made him feel as though Houston was now on the map, and the Rev. William States Jacobs, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, welcomed the new picture house as a new pulpit. Rabbi W. Willner was among the others who spoke in eulogizing terms of the Zoe, and its management. J. E. Davis, manager of the Zoe, explained that the name Zoe comes from a Greek word meaning "Life."

WORLD FILM CORPORATION SECURES LEW FIELD.

The newest announcement from the World Film Corporation offices that is in keeping with their crashing announcements of the past fortnight, assures us that Lew Field is to be seen in their photoplay service.

General Manager Lewis J. Selznick has arranged to have Mr. Field make his first appearance in "Old Dutch," which was one of the most successful plays in which he was seen while operating the Broadway Theater. Among the players engaged by the World Film Corporation to support Mr. Field in "Old Dutch" are Vivian Martin, who is appearing with him in "The High Cost of Loving," and who has made a very successful debut before the screen in the Owen Davis story, "The Wishing Ring," which is to be released by the World Film Corporation on November 9th, and George Hassel. Mr. Hassel is now appearing in "The High Cost of Loving."

NEW ITALA SUBJECTS COMING.

Two photo-play characters of undying interest, Tigris, the Super-Criminal, and Maciste, the physically perfect giant who continues to be the wonder of the thousands who are daily seeing "Cabiria," will be the subjects of two big Itala series, soon to be introduced to the American market. Work on both series has been in progress for almost a year.

Harry R. Raver announces that to the lot of Tigris will fall consecutive thrilling grapplings with the law, of the high sustained intensity of interest which made the first Tigris a thing of keen enjoyment and big profits to exchangemen and exhibitors everywhere.

To fit the Gibraltar-like proportions of Maciste, the marvel of brawn, scenarios have been written that will admirably display his prodigious strength. Heroic adventures of the variety that makes his part in "Cabiria," the massive Itala spectacle now playing in the largest theaters, one of salient power, come to him early and often.

Advices from Torino, Italy, where Itala films are made, evince the desire and intention of the Itala Company to send to Mr. Raver a class of photo-drama subjects comparing favorably with their masterpiece "Cabiria" and other Itala successes.

Detailed announcements will be made in this publication later regarding each of these productions.

"THE QUACK" (Lubin).

This melodrama tells of the checkered career of a semi-crook, who will do anything to get money without work or honest endeavor. Having killed a police officer a price is put upon his head and he has to flee to the West, leaving his wife and child in poverty. Years pass and he has become rich by the sale of a quack medicine. The boy develops consumption and the mother takes him West and by chance locates in the same town where the quack doctor has his headquarters. She is induced to try the medicine and it kills the boy. The father is brought to realize that his crookedness has caused the death of his own child. The picture has been made at the Lubin Los Angeles studio directed by Captain Wilbert Melville, and offers excellent roles to Velma Whitman, L. C. Shumway and a big cast of other able players.

"THE NINETY BLACK BOXES" (101 Bison).

And now we approach the fourth and last dramatic episode in the magnificent serial story of the mediaeval period, revolving around the romantic, adventurous life of Francois Villon, vagabond, poet and friend of King Louis XI. These dramas, as they have been adapted from Century Magazine, have been epoch-making in their effect in that they have established a new and higher standard for historical dramatic productions in America. In fact, as the reviewer of the Moving Picture World so aptly put it, "The camera becomes a veritable magic mirror to us in this delightful picture of the days of Francois Villon. Indeed, it is remarkable how convincing and like real human life these scenes from the long dead past are; there are village streets with the look of actuality and interiors full of naturalness that will accurately reflect the times."

One enjoys a delightful thrill, a pleasurable comfort, produced only by the finished piece of art, witnessing "The Ninety Black Boxes," which brings the adorable rascal, Villon, up to that point in his career where he forgoes the luxury of courts and the smiles of kings to return to his vagabond companions. The sentiment which the story embodies will be understood and appreciated by everyone; it is universal. The brilliant dueling scenes, the scenes in the palace of John Balue when Villon measures his wits against those of the famous jailer and the final reunion of Villon with his vagabond friends are all events which grip with a greater vidness than ever the master novelist's could.

Harry C. Stofford, as the author of the scenario, deserves a vast amount of credit. He has given smooth continuty to the various incidents and played up those which were logically deemed climaxes. Charles Giblyn has staged and directed the play with a perfection and skill that denotes profound study of the history and atmosphere of the period. Murdock MacQuarrie's characterization of the roisterer, Villon, is superb. The play in two reels, will be released Nov. 21.

Florence Nash in "Springtime"

THIRTY film players in a special car started for New Orleans on Monday. They were the star, Miss Florence Nash, and the actors and actresses who are to appear in Booth Tarkington's "Springtime," the first release the Life-Photo Film Corporation will make through Alco. Edwin M. Roskam, president of the producing organization, is in charge of the party. The object of the trip is to make the picturization in the scenes described by Mr. Tarkington.

Florence Nash.

In addition to Miss Nash, the star, members of the party were Miss Adele Ray, William H. Tooker, E. F. Roseman, Bert Gardner, Mrs. Sue Balfour, Frank Holland, E. F. Flannigan, Charles Travis, Warner P. Richmond, and others.

"Springtime," it will be remembered, is a story of the war of 1812, laid in and about New Orleans. Many of the structures mentioned in this former hit of the legitimate stage are still standing. Mr. Roskam, who has undertaken the general direction of the production and of the party, has determined to have as many of the scenes as possible enacted before the camera in their original locations. He plans to spend at least four weeks in New Orleans and the vicinity in this work. One of the undertakings of the company to which actors and actresses are looking forward to with the greatest pleasure, is the picturing of the old French quarter of New Orleans. Some of the scenes of "Springtime" were laid there.

Some of the interiors will be photographed in houses which date back to French days in New Orleans. Where this is found not to be practicable, studio work will be done. At a considerable outlay, Mr. Roskam is having special studios built. In order to have the proper atmosphere, properties and studio settings, Mr. Roskam is carrying with him to New Orleans fifteen sets of scenery and considerable properties. The costumes have been designed by artists who are thoroughly familiar with Colonial modes. The costumes of Miss Nash, who plays Madeline, are said to be very attractive and suit her dainty personality thoroughly. "Springtime" is a five-part subject and will be released through Alco on December 21.

McCRAY OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Frank C. McCray of the firm of McCray & McCray, Fairmont, West Virginia, spent a week or more in New York, recently, looking over the accessory market and getting a line on the latest pictures. Mr. McCray's firm handles supplies for picture theatres throughout the West Virginia coal region. It also owns one of the best theatres in that section. Mr. McCray reported a reasonably good exhibition business, but said that conditions were not up to the best at the present time.

A decided novelty in picture making has been achieved by Colin Campbell, who produced "In the Days of the Thundering Herd," for the Selig Polyscope Company. The pictures were taken on the historic buffalo ranch of "Pawnee Bill," at Pawnee, Okla., where Major Lillie ("Pawnee Bill") maintains a great ranch upon which roams one of the biggest herds of buffalo now in existence. The buffalo have practically free range over the big ranch and live under the same conditions which existed when that part of the country was a portion of the so-called "buffalo grounds."

"Pawnee Bill," who is a chief of the Pawnee nation, furnishes the site for an Indian village containing over 700 people. These Indians participated in the taking of the picture "In the Days of the Thundering Herd," and furnish the greater part of the action, together with the herd of buffalo. In the picture the buffalo dash to and fro across prairie, being stampeded by Indians and cowboys to produce the desired effect.

Scene from "In the Days of the Thundering Herd" (Selig).

The story presents the typical features of frontier life in the days of '49. It is from the pen of Gilson Willets. There are over two score "prairie schooners," or emigrant wagons, hundreds of horses, an army of white men and a whole tribe of Indians appearing in the photoplay. Tom Mix has the leading role, and is alway prominent in the picture with his daring feats of horsemanship, etc. Charming Bessie Eyton is at her best in this picture, portraying a settler's daughter, who is beset by Indians, but who is finally rescued by the indomitable Tom Mix, who appears in the character of a pony express rider.

The picture is a most entertaining and interesting one. It is full of action, and the lavish use of such unusual features as are represented in the picture, create a decidedly realistic and spectacular photoplay which undoubtedly will be profitable for exhibitors.

"In the Days of the Thundering Herd" will be released through the General Film Company November 30. It is a five-reel special.

THE PIKE'S PEAK FILMS COMPANY.

With the organization and incorporation of The Pike's Peak Films Company, the state of Colorado in general, and Colorado Springs in particular, will receive additional notation throughout the motion picture world. The company was organized for $150,000, and already the studio at 610 N. Cascade avenue, Colorado Springs, has been completely fitted up for a studio and factory. The company expects to produce and print at least five reels per month, and possibly more.

The corporation is headed by Major Charles T. Lowndes of Colorado Springs, and Otis B. Thayer, formerly with the Selig-Polyscope Co., is managing director. Mr. Thayer will have full charge of the producing and playing, and he will be supported by a very fine company headed by Miss Josephine West and E. F. Cobb in the leads. Mr. Thayer is well known in the moving picture world, and with the company he has gathered together, he expects to make a name for the new company in short time, and to make The Pike's Peak Films known from one end of the country to the other.

Frank Crane Directing "As Ye Sow"

DIRECTOR Frank Crane and the "As Ye Sow" Company, who are making the Alice Brady feature for the World Film Corporation, are working in East Gloucester, Mass. In a recent edition of the Gloucester Times, the doings of the company received considerable attention, part of which is reproduced below.

"There are 11 principals in the play and 20 people who take minor parts as sailors and spectators. Little Miss Jane Lee, of New York, a sweet, winsome lassie of two years seven months, with laughing blue eyes and flaxen hair, is the youngest actor in the company."

Frank H. Crane.

"Miss Alice Brady daughter of the famous William A. Brady, is the star. Other players of prominence in the acting are Mr. Fischter, Beverly West, Mr. MacLean and John Hines."

"It was the original plan of the company to have the setting in the play at Cape Cod, but owing to Gloucester being more accessible and the character of the shore being so beautiful at East Gloucester, it was decided to have the company here. The picturesque cottage and surroundings of the former Woods estate, now owned by W. Jay Little, has been engaged for a part of the setting. Places along Brace's Cove, Eastern Point, have also been frequented. Later, the company will go to Norman's Woe, where a wreck will figure in the story. The old coaster 'Island Home,' owned by T. E. Reed and used formerly as a salt lighter, has been purchased by the film company and in a few days, as soon as masts are stripped and a favorable rough sea is on, the exciting part of the drama will be put on.

"The company is making headquarters at the Harbor View Hotel. Fine and favorable weather has thus far given success to operations and some rough sea weather is now anticipated."

Crane began his motion picture career with the Thanhouser Company, and was their leading man for two years. He later became a leading man for the Lubin Company. Realizing that there were greater opportunities as a director, than in being a leading man, Mr. Crane devoted himself to direction, and received his baptism in this work with the Universal Company.

INCE HAS HIS OWN INDIANS AND COWBOYS.

A drastic change in the affairs of Thomas H. Ince's New York Motion Picture Corporation took effect on October 16, when the picture company and the Miller Brothers agreed to a discontinuance of the contract whereby cowboys, Indians and livestock were furnished for purposes of the screen.

Hereafter, therefore, instead of employing its men and horses from the ranch owners, Inceville will control all its equipment. Steps toward the carrying out of this plan were taken several weeks ago, when it was first decided not to renew the contract and as a result of Mr. Ince's activities, fifty men, two dozen Indians, 150 horses and several hundred head of cattle and other livestock, are now being housed at the company's camp in the Santa Ynez canyon under the absolute control of the film-producing company.

HARRY LAUDER VISITS UNIVERSAL CITY.

During his stay in Los Angeles, where he appeared at the Majestic theater, Harry Lauder, his wife and William Morris, his manager, were guests at the Universal's West Coast plant. Under the personal guidance of general manager Isadore Bernstein the little party was introduced to several Universal photoplayers, countrymen of the comedian. After watching several of the companies at work at the studio, the party motored to Universal City, where Mr. Lauder was initiated into the mysteries of production of several of the big features the company is staging at present.

REVISED SIMPLEX EQUIPMENT FOR 1915.
Precision Machine Company, Inc., Announces It Is Now Ready to Deliver Its Latest Apparatus.

THE Precision Machine Company, Inc., has been delivering, since November 9, its 1915 revised Simplex equipment, which it announces in spite of the advance in quality carries no advance in price. For the regular equipment "B" the figure is $300; with motor drive, $355; regular equipment with type S lamp, $355; regular equipment with type S lamp and motor drive, $410. The Simplex Catalogue AA explains a lot about the details of the new standard magazines, the wire glass window in the upper magazine, the improved take-up device, the optical system and the rheostat.

As pointed out in the company's illustrated advertisement in last week's issue of this journal the new standard magazines are of drawn steel in two pieces from No. 18 gauge steel, inside diameter 16 inches, accommodating any size reels up to 15½ inches. Underwriters' requirements are fulfilled on all motor-driven machines. Through the quarter-inch 3 by 4 inch wire glass window the film may be seen without opening the door, thereby reducing the fire hazard.

By the improved take-up device a reversible pulley permits use of regular reels or Bell & Howell special with five-inch hubs recommended for 2,000 feet. In the optical system there is an option on a No. 1 Gundlach motion picture or a Crown special motion picture objective. Other features are an achromatic stereopticon two lens single combination objective and a set of imported optical glass condensers. The rheostat is inclosed 110-volt grid, adjustable; underwriters' approval, increased to 50 amperes.

BLINKHORN PHOTOPLAYS CORPORATION.

It is a distinguishing trait of Englishmen generally that instead of making a big splurge about what they are going to do, they quietly set to work, accomplish their aims, and talk about their achievements only when pressed to do so by some inquisitive scribe.

Genial Albert Blinkhorn is no exception to this rule. "Blinkie," as he is known to his intimates, is the man who put the American market "Hep" to Hepworth's brand. Unobtrusively, but none the less thoroughly, he pushed the Hepworth films to the forefront during his first two years residence here, and the result of his work was seen in the formation of the Hepworth American Corporation, of which he was the first President and General Manager.

A select coterie of shrewd New York merchants, impressed by Mr. Blinkhorn's business acumen formerly devoted so wholeheartedly to the Hepworth interests, approached him with the suggestion that a chain of film exchanges carrying a large range of carefully selected features, comedies, "educationals," "scenic," and "scientifics," to be inaugurated under the name and title of Blinkhorn Photoplays Corporation, looked considerably attractive in their eyes—always provided that "Blinkie" would act as President and General Manager.

Within the comparatively short period of three months, Mr. Blinkhorn has not only acquired the rights on a great number of excellent features of varied makes and brands, but has also successfully launched branch exchanges at such widely separated points as Philadelphia, Chicago, San Francisco, Atlanta, Dallas, Cleveland, Denver, and Seattle, and plans to open further exchanges in Boston and Buffalo at a very early date. Every exchange of the Blinkhorn Photoplays Corporation is under the management of an expert in the exchange end of the game. "Blinkie" leaves nothing to chance, and has therefore equipped his exchanges in such manner that they may be compared favorably with those of any other concern handling high-grade product. And he has, moreover, wisely surrounded himself at headquarters with a staff of loyal and efficient aids in every department.

Enterprise such as is displayed by Mr. Blinkhorn is certain of obtaining its due reward in this country where merit counts above every other consideration. As to the current releases of the Blinkhorn Photoplays Corporation and the location of its various branch exchanges, we refer our readers to the advertising columns of this issue.

GLORIA FILMS FOR L. GERMAIN.

L. Germain, who has but recently graduated from the exhibiting ranks into the feature exchange business, has secured two pictures of considerable merit from the Gloria Company, of Turin, whom he now represents. One is a feature in which Lyda Borelli, the famous Italian actress plays the principal part and which consists of five parts. The other, which is a little shorter, presents a very pretty and pathetic story and has been praised by all who saw it.

Notes of the Trade

THERE is considerable conjecture as to who will be sent to the coast when the new Thanhouser cast is sent there to do pictures this winter.

Owing to his excellent showing directing the Turner Special Feature company during Mr. Turner's trip east, Frank Lloyd is to be a director of a new Universal company to be organized especially for him. George Larkin, present masculine lead with the Gold Seal Company, is to be Mr. Lloyd's lead, opposite will be Helen Leslie. Mr. Lloyd will play the heavy character leads and Marc Robbins, formerly of the Kerrigan-Victor company, will do characters. The films are to be released under the Rex brand.

A minute inspection of one of the mansions of Pasadena, Cal., and a complete inventory of the lavish furnishings contained therein helped to make absolutely genuine in reproduction "The Master of the House," a coming feature release of the Ince companies. One of the most powerful scenes in the story is that depicting a ballroom in the home that has been provided by the millionaire westerner for his wife.

Sidney Bracy began the interior work on "Sid Nee's Finish" at the Thanhouser studio on Thursday. He will finish the picture this week. Kellette wrote the script.

While a scene was being taken for "The Girl of the Open Road," the second of the series "Olive's Opportunities," Mabel Trunnelle, the Edison leading lady, tripped on her hobble skirt and rolled down an entire flight of stairs. When picked up Miss Trunnelle was somewhat dazed but unhurt.

Richard C. Travers plays an unusually realistic part in the rescue of a girl from a hotel in "Fires of Fate," released by Essanay Nov. 3. All the fire scenes are made at actual fires which took place in Chicago. As it was necessary to wait for chances to take these scenes, more than a year was consumed in making the pictures in order to insure them of realistic action.

Rosie Rosenbach was greeted with many smiles upon his return to the office of the Excelsior Feature Film Co., and the entire office force is happy. Things were dull without Rosie. This celebrated gentleman had quite an adventurous trip to Chicago, but looks none the worse.

Charles M. Seay, Edison director, is working on a two-reel comedy entitled "Lena." The versatility of Miriam Nesbitt, the girl who disguises herself as a maid, in order to improve the condition of domestic servants, is greatly exemplified in this film. * * *

Victor Potel, in the Essanay comedy, "Slippery Slim and the Impersonator," released November 5, used a real diamond ring, which figures in a part in the play, instead of an imitation sparkler, and lost it. Consequently he is mourning $150 of good money, which he paid for it.

As an equestrienne Cora Williams is alone in her class. While teaching the art to Andy Clark, the youthful Edison star, along the bridle path in Bronx Park, his horse took fright and started off with Andy clinging desperately to the saddle. Miss Williams gave chase and halted the maddened steed in time to save Andy from being thrown to the ground.

It will be strange when "A Political Feud," an Ince feature, treating of an urchin's rise to worldly success, is released, to note with what a fine degree of perfection both Richard Stanton and Arthur Maude have personified the college youth. Mr. Stanton has had a long association with the American stage, while Mr. Maude is equally as well known in English theatrical circles.

Thomas H. Ince is rapidly acquiring the title of "the busiest man in the movies." He devoted the entire summer to two of his biggest feature films—"The Two-Gun Man" and "On the Night Stage." Although they are scarcely off his hands, he is now superintending the production of a third masterpiece, "The Italian." "The Two-Gun Man" is a seven-reel western thriller, with William S. Hart in the stellar role. "On the Night Stage" is another western story, but of a different type. This will offer Robert Edeson, William S. Hart and Rhea Mitchell in a tri-star combination. "The Italian" is a tense dramatic narrative of the slums and will have George Beban as its principal. Miss Mitchell is the leading woman of the Ince studios, while Edeson, Hart and Beban all have been specially engaged for their respective productions.

Bob Newman has entered the employ of Doc Willat, Fort Lee, N. J., as outside property man. Bob held the same position with the Thanhouser studio for a long time, and is sure to make good in his new berth.

* * *

W. R. Scates, F. H. Vine, J. J. Rotchford, A. N. Webster and C. L. Worthington are well-known film managers who recently have resigned from the Eclectic Film company to take other positions. Arthur S. Kane, general manager of branches, left at the same time.

PITTSBURGH.

MYER SILVERMAN, manager of the Liberty Film Renting Company, gave his much-awaited banquet to exhibitors of the Pittsburgh district last week, and it was a finely-attended and successful affair. Not a regret was received. Harry B. Day, M. Feth, Peter Autonoplos, L. F. Behan and others of the guests made notable speeches and so successful was the banquet that the feasters determined that there would be more get-together affairs of the sort among the Pittsburgh exhibitors. Among those present were H. D. Ansell, Victoria theater, Uniontown, Pa.; Harry Mentz, Evaline theater, 5150 Penn avenue, Pittsburgh; George Bates, manager Pittsburgh Commercial Motion Picture Company; M. Feth, New York Telegram; Charles Seltzer, 341 Liberty avenue, Pittsburgh; Leonard Elswick, Kiski theater, Vandergrift, Pa.; George M. Downs, Jr., Pittsburgh Dispatch; Harry B. Day, Box Office Attractions Company, Pittsburgh; A. Lax, Cameraphone theater, Sharpsburg, Pa.; A. H. Berg, McKeesport, Pa.; H. S. Cunningham, Southern theater, Wheeling, W. Va.; Jerome Dawson, Victoria theater, Gallitzin, Pa.; George Sapper, manager Pittsburgh Wholesale Credit Association, Pittsburgh.

The Feature Film & Calcium Light Company report lively interest in the Baird projection machine and excellent satisfaction on the part of purchasers. The Calcium people have secured exclusive territory for the Baird machine extending from Harrisburg to Cleveland and from the Great Lakes to the Ohio river.

Wormald & Thompson, who now operate a motion picture house in Conneautville, Pa., are building another one in the same town, which will be completed December 1. It will be erected according to the regulations as outlined by the recent code commission, and will have a capacity of 250 seats. It will be thoroughly fireproof and up-to-date.

W. J. Whittington has re-opened his Family theater, West End, Pittsburgh, Pa., after having had it closed for a year.

Manager A. Dresner, of Warner's Features, at the request of R. M. Thompson, advertising manager of Pickering's furniture store and general manager of "tag day," has donated fifty slides which will be shown in as many moving picture houses throughout the city for the purpose of advertising the "tag day."

J. Louis Breitinger, chief State censor, says in a letter to J. F. Behan, manager of the J. Frank Hatch Film Company that he could arrange to have his films censored in Pittsburgh, provided Mr. Behan obtain a suitable room for that purpose and pay the expenses in connection therewith at the time the films are being censored. This will prove a great convenience to most film men in Pittsburgh, as the arrangement eliminates express charges and, most important of all, obviates delay and the consequent inactivity of the films.

The Pittsburgh cameraman, George Bates, was in Westfield, N. Y., for several days last week, where he made a film for the Welch Grape Juice Company, which own mammoth vineyards and wine cellars in that district. The films show the entire wine-making process, starting with a panoramic view of the acres of vines, followed by the picking of the grapes, the hauling to the factory and the various processes through which the grapes pass until they are finally bottled, labeled and packed for shipping. The film will be shown at conventions, expositions and other gatherings of those interested in the production of wines.

MISSOURI.

P. GOLDSTONE, manager of the Omaha branch of the Box Office Attractions and also an exhibitor of that city, was in Kansas City recently conferring with District Manager Dembow.

The Eclectic Exchange reports that it has the five copies of the "Perils of Pauline" booked for six months ahead.

H. F. Tighe, of the Lappe-Tiche Amusement Company, which opened the Willis Wood theater recently, states that "Neptune's Daughter" has been a great success. It was booked for a week at first, but proved to be so very popular that it was booked for five days more. More people have seen this film than any picture that ever came to Kansas City. Mr. Tighe states that more than 7,000 people have seen it daily; at this rate more than 84,000 people have seen it during its stay in Kansas City.

G. E. Akers, representative for the Box Office Attractions, is making an extensive trip through Missouri, lining up theaters to use the big features that will begin to make their appearance at the Kansas City office about November 9. The Wonderland theater in Kansas City is using all the regular releases of the company.

Tom Magruder, a well-known Oklahoma picture man, was in Kansas City recently and reports that his business has been fine all summer and that the facts that there is no market for cotton and that the present price of oil is low have not affected his receipts in the least. Mr. Magruder operates a theater in Perry, Okla., and was in Kansas City to make arrangements to secure "The Perils of Pauline" for that theater.

N. H. Spitzer, manager of the Kansas City office of the World Film Corporation, has been called to New York on account of the illness of his mother. He left Kansas City Sunday, October 25, and it is not known just when he will return. Mrs. Spitzer, who is well versed in the business, will take his place until his return.

M. Leishin, traveling representative for the World Film Corporation, has returned to Kansas City after making an extensive trip through Oklahoma and Arkansas. He is converted to the idea that the moving picture is a permanent insituation after what he witnessed in those two states, where cotton and oil are big factors in business. He says that in spite of the fact that there is no market for cotton and that the price of oil is lower than it has been for years, the theaters are all doing their usual amount of business.

The Inter-State Film Company of Kansas City, handling Sawyers Features, has moved from the Gibraltar Building to the Floyd Building. They will now occupy two rooms on the fourth floor of this building. This makes the seventh company to take offices there.

The Box Office Attractions of Kansas City have put on William Warner as a representative for the company in the territory southwest of Kansas City. Mr. Warner is well known to the exhibitors of that territory and he has had a wide experience in the film business, so there is not much question but that he will make a success.

The Standard Amusement Company of Kansas City has redecorated the front of its Main street theater, the Palace. This house has been working to a disadvantage all summer; the streets in front have been torn up while new paving was being put in and it made it most difficult for people to cross. Besides this, a restaurant building next door has been under construction for two months. However, the management reports that the house has been making money all summer, and if that is the case, it is entitled to a "new dress."

Joe Gilday, manager of the Broadmore theater and booker for the Lappe-Tihge Company and the Standard Amusement Company in Kansas City, has for several weeks been forced to turn people away on Friday night, when he shows "The Million Dollar Mystery," while at the same there were many children in the audience that paid only five cents each. So he devised a scheme to get the children's nickels and not turn anybody away at night. Here, exhibitor, is the secret: At five o'clock Friday night he gives a bargain show for children who were just coming home from school; this show includes the "Million Dollar Mystery" and five other reels and is over before the evening shows commence. "In this way," says Mr. Gilday, "I show to three or four hundred children in the afternoon, and at the same time am not forced to turn down any ten-cent admissions at night. Besides, the children enjoy it more, because they go wild over the "Million Dollar Mystery" and I allow them to yell and whoop all they want to, which I would not permit at the evening shows."

The recent fire at the Universal Exchange, in Kansas City, has caused all the exchange managers to take extra precautions. Perhaps the most interesting feature of preventive equipment is a film carrier that went through the Universal fire, which Manager J. C. Woolf, of Warner's Features, has hung in the shipping room of his exchange. The carrier shows the effect of the fire and has a sign upon it which reads, "No Smoking." Although the Universal fire was not caused by smoking, so far as known, the result would be the same, and the message that the carrier conveys has its effect, not only upon the employees, but upon those who come to the office for service.

N. H. Spitzer, manager of the World Film Corporation, of Kansas City, has received word that America was shown to over 10,000 people the opening day Hippodrome at Springfield, Mo. The Hippodrome is the largest theater in the state with the exception of St. Louis and Kansas City, and seats about 3,100. BROWN.

CINCINNATI.

AS one of the first educational institutions to arrange for the practical use, in connection with existing courses, of motion pictures, it is very appropriate that the University of Cincinnati should also be among the first to make arrangements for the participation of its students in the newest branch of literary work, scenario writing. The students will compete for a prize of $50, offered by a local film-producing company for the best three-reel scenario, so written that it can be produced in local surroundings; and a large number of them have indicated their intention of attempting to win the prize.

In connection with the vigorous political campaign now nearing its end in Cincinnati, as well as the rest of Ohio, various interests have seen the value of motion pictures in advancing themselves before the voters, and have accordingly employed the screen, both for the purpose of attracting crowds and driving home their arguments. At a recent Democratic meeting, which was addressed by various speakers, a screen entertainment of several reels was used for the purpose of illustrating the good work claimed for the State and National administrations; while the advocates of woman suffrage, one of the issues up at the election, have used several films made for the express purpose of demonstrating the actual need of women for the vote for their own protection. A booth has been set up on Fountain Square, containing a projecting machine, which flashes everything from photographs to motion pictures on a sheet, and helps keep the crowds interested. It might very well be called a picture campaign.

Another moving picture romance, making the seventeenth, or thereabouts, reported in this vicinity lately, has occurred, Hamilton, O., being the scene, or at least, the residence of the parties. Kindred Spaulding and Hacel McKee, both of whom are pianists at the Eagle theater, in that city, fell in love with each other's playing, and slipped away one day last week and were married across the river, in Covington, Ky. After a brief honeymoon they returned home and to work.

One of the best-liked stars on the legitimate stage, Ethel Barrymore, has apparently lost none of her drawing power as a star of the moving picture stage, judging by the manner in which her appearance in the film production of "The Nightingale" brought crowds to the Orpheum on the evening that drama was shown at the Walnut Hills house. It is becoming an old story for the Orpheum to "turn 'em away," but on this occasion it seemed that the crowds waiting outside continually were enough to fill the house easily, and as a matter of fact, it was kept crowded during the entire evening. There is no talk whatever of attempting any other form of attraction at the big houses than pictures, as long as the management finds that several capacity audiences can be handled every evening.

By special request, according to the management of the Columbia theater of Dayton, coming from a large number who found themselves unable to get into the Columbia theater during the recent first run of "One Wonderful Night," the popular production in which Francis X. Bushman is featured, a return engagement of the play was handled last week, drawing quite as well as when it was first shown in Dayton.

"Paramount Pictures" are making a decided hit with patrons of the Majestic theater, in Dayton, according to the management of that popular house. "The Making of Bobby Burnit" and Robert Edeson in "The Call of the North" were two of these productions which were shown there last week, pulling big houses.

The new Market street theater, in Youngstown, O., which recently opened its doors, has far more than met the expectations of its proprietors and managers in the size of the audiences filling it for the various shows. It is one of the handsomest houses in that part of Ohio, and bids fair to be one of the most popular as well. People evidently like to see moving pictures in a handsome theater, and as the management is specializing on features of high quality, there seems to be no reason why the initial success of the house should not continue.

Manager W. D. Clark, of the Columbia theater, Marion, O., falling in line with the tendency toward the exhibition of first-class multireel features regularly, recently announced to his patrons that he has made arrangements to show the various productions appearing under the general title of "Paramount Pictures," and also for the forthcoming George Kleine productions.

Jacob Pfau, an enterprising baker of Portsmouth, O., who was one of the numerous business men of the city with booth at the recent fall festival, or "Korn Karnival," held there, drew public attention to the toothsome bakery products shown at his booth by the simple expedient of showing moving pictures every evening. This drew the crowds and enabled the baker to advertise his business extensively and effectively. CASEY.

KENTUCKY.

THE high cost of living," "business depression" and similar phases are used in many lines of business to account for quiet times just now, but none of the conditions appear to be hurting the motion picture business in the least. The legitimate theaters have not drawn as heavily this winter as usual, but even the outskirt theaters of the motion picture type are handling crowds that are said to be above normal for this time of year. The local exhibitors are well pleased with results and a number of rumors are going the rounds as to new motion picture houses to be started shortly.

The Kentucky Gold Fish Farms is the name of the concern which has been established at 424 West Green street, Louisville, which will supply gold fish to be used as premiums by motion picture theaters throughout this district. The Owl Feature Film Company began to handle gold fish last fall and has disposed of large quantities during the past year. The gold fish are generally given as premiums on a regular premium night and are placed in oyster pails until carried home by the theater patrons. One of the front windows of the store building here has been made to represent an artificial lake, and a number of gold fish will be exhibited at all times. Lewis Berg and some other local motion picture men are interested in the proposition.

V. R. Skaggs, of Barrallton, Ky., a traveling exhibitor who has made most of the cross roads towns of Kentucky several times this summer, was in Louisville during the past week.

Film & Supply Company, of Louisville, as road man, has given up his position to go with the Kentucky State Racing Commission as auditor. At present he is stationed at the Latonia track.

A convention of the Kentucky Grand Lodge of Masons, which held its session in Louisville during the past week, attracted a few motion picture men from the far South. Among the visitors were E. While in Louisville the two men called on the local exhibitors and some of the film exchanges.

The Knickerbocker theater, which is to occupy the old market house at Eighteenth and Market streets, will be opened soon. The promoters have almost completed remodeling and will be ready to announce an opening date in the near future. Two Powers 6A, motor-driven machines have been purchased for the house.

Business at the Star theater, at Fourth and Jefferson streets, Louisville, was severely curtailed last Saturday evening by an explosion of a fuse in a conduit manhole on Fourth avenue. The trouble occurred between 8 and 9 o'clock, and the house was dark for over half an hour. Only about ten people remained in the theater and the box office was compelled to quit selling tickets until the lights were on again. Even the box office was in darkness as well as the electric sign on the front of the building.

The Empire theater, at Shelby and Market streets, Louisville, was in a like fix a few nights ago, when a big fire at Second and Main streets put the lights "on the hummer" for the rest of the night. At the time of the break a section of the "Million Dollar Mystery" was being shown and the house was packed. The theater has been crowded to capacity every night since the new addition was built.

Interior work on the Alamo theater, Louisville, of the Fourth Avenue Amusement Company is coming along rapidly and the theater will be ready by November 14, unless something unexpected happens. L. J. Brosemer, who is in charge of the poultry bureau for the Agricutural Department of Tennessee, was recently in Louisville attending a convention of the Southern Poultry and Egg Shippers' Association. He made a long address concerning conditions on poultry raising in Tennessee and used a motion picture machine to show the various kinds of coops and housing for fine breeds of chickens and the manner of hatching by incubation. These same pictures are used in five counties in Tennessee to show the farmers how to increase their poultry product. It is said that both Kentucky and Tennessee will devote more money to this feature of the work next year.

Moving pictures of the old trails, mostly taken in Kansas, by the M. B. Faidley Company, are said to have turned out well, and will soon be shown through the state. The pictures now available represent scenes westward from Kansas City to Trinidad, Col. Later the moving picture men will take pictures eastward to New York, and put them on view at houses in the districts through which the trails pass. The moving picture feature is an adjunct of the campaign to revive interest in the old trails, and to mark them; the ulterior motive being the stimulation of the building of cross-continent highways.

ILLINOIS.

MOVING pictures play an important part in the lives of the residents of Springfield, according to the survey of the Russell Sage Foundation, which recently has been completed at the state capitol. In mentioning this survey some time ago the Moving Picture World commented on the fact that this was the first thorough survey undertaken in any city of consequence in the United States. From the point of view of exhibitors throughout the country the most important finding is that the amusements of the city that are conducted for gain form a very real part of the local recreation resources. "They should be used, not suppressed," says the report. This can be accomplished by proper inspection and regulation. In the section of the survey which relates to the activities of neighborhood life, it is recommended that parent-teachers and other organizations conduct motion picture shows. The results of the inspection of ten photoplay houses in the city are summarized as follows:

"In March, 1914, when the recreation survey was made, ten motion picture theaters were in operation. Upon investigation it was found that as respects ventilation and cleanliness, only two or three of the houses were not in fairly satisfactory condition. As a rule also the illumination of the auditorium was sufficient to minimize objectionable conduct and, as far as could be observed, order was fairly well maintained. The programs were of the average character. No unclean pictures were observed, although not all of them bore the approval of the National Board of Censorship, which, of course, is the best test of fitness we have.

"The city ordinances contain regulations regarding the licensing of moving picture shows and also specify how the cinematograph machine shall be installed and housed. The latter, if properly enforced, are adequate for the avoidance of fire hazards peculiar to this sort of enterprise. The regulations, however, are defective in their requirements regarding the moral conditions surrounding the motion picture business."

Episodes 113 and 114 in the serial "Blame it on the Pictures" have just been released. No. 113 is "water stuff." Rivermen on the Mississippi River near Rock Island had rotten excursion business last year and attribute it to the fact that the people would rather see the photoplays than ride in the moonlight. No. 114 is adapted from the report of the Russell Sage Foundation Recreation Survey at Springfield. The reporter who adapted it has introduced many situations not found in the original. He charges that the boys of the capital city hurry directly from school to the picture theaters in such large numbers that it is but a question of time when a youth who engages in outdoor sports after 3 o'clock will be a rarity. The fact that 71 per cent. of the Springfield youths play baseball is buried.

The New York Central "Safety First" car is working through Indiana, giving moving picture exhibits showing how accidents happen through wrong operating methods and how such mistakes may be avoided by right methods, the right methods being in the pictures.

Mayor Galer, Postmaster Herzog, Chas. Ostrom, Geo. Senger and John B. Berschelt, of Mishawaka, Ind., went to Chicago recently to see J. R. Mills in an effort to induce Mr. Mills to build a three-story building in Mishawaka on a property where he now contemplates a one-story structure. The men who called on Mr. Mills want him to make it a theater building. Messrs. Berschelt and Senger are exhibitors, owning the Century and Princess theaters.

O. R. Sebring, manager of the Wallace theater, Peru, Ind., has just completed the remodeling of the lobby and exterior of the house. Chas. A. Holden, former manager of the Wallace, has bought a farm near Rochester, Ind.

The Luna theater, Tipton, enjoyed such exceptional attendance at their showing of "Samson" that they have decided to use other big features.

Manager Gravel, of Gravel's theater, Goodland, Ind., recently gave an exhibition of educational pictures for children, charging an admission fee of 2 cents to pay expenses. Mr. Gravel expects to make pictures of this kind of frequent appearance at his house and will not raise the admission price.

Among the moving picture men of Indiana who know of it, the success of Manager Sweeton of the Orpheum theater, Evansville, at getting realistic effects from his musicians, is a frequent subject of comment. Mr. Sweeton has an idea that moving pictures are not enjoyable unless the music can be made to add a realistic effect. He has worked with his musicians, a piano player and a trap drummer, until they have grasped his idea. The result is that the Orpheum is setting the pace in this respect and Manager Sweeton is the envy of some of his competitors, who are trying to duplicate his efforts.

In South Bend recently a test was made of 748 school children. Of this number 41 per cent. preferred educational films, 30 per cent. dramas, 27 per cent. comedies, and only 2 per cent. crime. Of three thousand pupils one-half attended a picture show one or more times a week and only 10 per cent. did not attend at all.

The Crystal theater, Decatur, Ind., has donated the house to the local Presbyterian church for a show to raise Christmas funds.

The Business Men's Bible class of the Central Avenue M. E. Church has established a moving picture outfit in the Sunday school room. This is the first attempt in Indianapolis to adapt the moving picture to Sunday School.

The Indiana Union, the Indiana University organization at Bloomington, will buy a moving picture machine. In order to finance the moving picture show idea the students are selling tickets good for ten shows for $3. For members of the Indiana Union the price is $2.

Frank A. Davis, of Kansas City, secretary of the National Old Trails Highway Association, gave a moving picture show in the Arc theater at Brazil to show scenes along the National Old Trails Highway. Brazil will be on the highway when it is completed.

A Woman Who Dared

NOTHING more appealing can be imagined than when Judith, the beautiful and devout widow, goes forth to the tent of the cruel and sensuous Holofernes, compelled hither by the anguish of her starving people. We see this pure and lovely woman don the garb of a courtesan in order to captivate the grim Prince. And then, with a great human touch, we see her begin to love the enthroned Prince. We hold our breath and fight back the tears—that terrible scene in the tent of Holofernes, when Judith is alone with him, the suspense grips you like a vise. She has plied him with wine until he sleeps in a drunken stupor. She lifts the sword to strike. Then her love and desire sweep over her—she puts down the sword and, instead of killing the monster, she caresses him. Then to her eyes comes the vision of her people, a pitiful picture of famine and slaughter; and her struggle with the unholy passion is over and Holofernes meets his doom.

So enthusiastic does one become over the triumph of Judith, and so strong is the magnetism of this heart gripping story, that it creates a desire within you to see it over and over again.

There, I have gone ahead and allowed myself to attempt the impossible. That is, I have tried to describe one of the many stirring scenes in

THE ADVENTURES OF THE LOST WIFE (11th of the Octavius Amateur Detective Series —Nov. 16).—Things had been going rather slowly for Octavius when the morning mail brought an invitation from Mrs. Burton to join them at Pinehurst. Welcoming a few days in the country, Octavius wired his acceptance and started for the train. The Burtons were a very lively couple, and perfect harmony reigned throughout their home as long as the subject of dancing was not broached. Mrs. Burton was intensely fond of the pastime, whereas her husband's attitude was just the reverse. It so happened that they had a violent quarrel on this subject the night before Octavius arrived in Pinehurst, and the following morning Mrs. Pinehurst had disappeared, leaving behind her a note to the effect that she did not expect to return.

Burton rushed out of the house in an effort to find his wife and the entire household was in an uproar when Octavius appeared on the scene. Mrs. Burton's mother gave him the harrowing details, and, spurred on by his detective instincts, he first put the servants through a grilling examination, then examined the grounds and found suspicious footprints which led to the boat house. His search an the bay culminated in his finding an empty boat, but when he tried to examine it closely he fell overboard and just barely managed to get ashore, holding on to his own boat, while the other one floated away.

His landing place was a barren island, and it was there that Mrs. Burton had taken refuge. As she sat calmly reading, she was surprised at seeing Octavius approaching, drenched from head to foot. He soon convinced her that it would be best to return home, but when they started for his boat they found, to their horror, that his boat had also drifted away, and they were marooned in earnest. They spent a rather miserable hour or two before Mr. Burton arrived in a motor boat and took his wife home with him. Octavius, in the meantime, had caught his boat, but, the oars being lost, he was forced to paddle slowly home with a piece of plank, a sadder but a wiser man.

A MOMENT OF MADNESS (Nov. 17).—When Inez arrived in New York to pay a long deferred visit to her old school mate, the two girls indulged in a fund of reminiscences but each discovered that a subtle change had taken place in the other's mental attitude since graduation day, and a certain feeling of restraint gradually came over them for which it was difficult to account. This feeling was added to when Rita met Jack Aldridge, whose personality so captivated her imagination that she soon lost sight of the loyalty due her friend. Aldridge was madly in love with Rita and took no pains to conceal it and this fact made Inez all the more determined to capture him for herself.

She employed every means in her power to attract his attentions, but, to her chagrin, her wiles seemed to have no effect upon the young man. Matters were at this stage when they all started for a cruise in the Willis' yacht. Then again Inez tried to capture Jack's attention, but, failing in this, her jealousy served to blind her to everything except the object of her infatuation and she decided upon desperate methods. Feigning illness, she slipped down into the cabin, her mind hardly made up to any distinct plan. Catching sight of a knife on the buffet, she hid it in the folds of her dress and returned to the deck where she perceived Rita and Jack standing together on the rail. Walking up to where they stood, Inez climbed upon the rail and, prompted by her blind fit of jealousy, she reached up and cut the rope to which Rita was holding.

With a scream Rita fell into the water, and, as Jack sprang after her, he accidentally brushed against Inez, and she, likewise fell screaming into the sea. The tide was strong and Jack had a struggle in saving his sweetheart, a sailor dived after Inez but before he could reach her, she was drowned and it was only a lifeless body which he bruight back to the yacht. The knife and the freshly-cut rope showed only too plainly how the whole thing had occurred, and pity, more than scorn, filled the hearts of all present for the poor misguided girl who had wrecked her life in a moment of madness.

BUSTER BROWN AND THE GERMAN BAND (Nov. 18).—Buster had a party. Knowing him as we do, that would have, seemingly, offered enough variety for one day. It turned out differently, however, when Buster heard "Dot leetle German band" playing down the street. A quiet consultation with Mary Jane and Tige developed a plan that was calculated to disturb such remnants of peace as might still hover around the Brown household. As Mrs. Brown was likewise entertaining a few friends, Buster decided that a serenade was just the proper thing to finish off the day.

A bargain was quickly struck with the leader of the band and the children led them to the house, and so placed them that the full blast of harmony (?) would go right through the window near which Mrs. Brown and her guests were seated. The clarinette squeaked and the horns blared in a perfect orgy of discord. The goat was sleeping peacefully, dreaming dreams of unlimited pasture and mischief. His awakening was a rude one, and he proceeded to prepare for an onslaught, but his rope held him fast. The ladies tried their best to stop the racket, but Buster urged on the band with cries of "Louder! Louder!" and the musicians redoubled their efforts. Finally, the goat succeeded in working the rope loose and just as Mrs. Brown appeared on the scene, he came charging around the corner and scattered everything right and left.

A MILITARY MIX-UP (Nov. 18).—Things began badly at the breakfast table for Tightwad, as Mrs. Tightwad discovered a most alluring advertisement in the morning paper of a hat sale, and began teasing for money to buy a new hat which she had greatly admired. Tightwad refused her indignantly, telling her that she already had more hats than she would ever be able to wear out, and started for his office in a rage. His arrival there, like a whirlwind, set everything in motion, and the repeated calls of Mrs. Tightwad over the phone, pleading for the new hat only served to add fuel to his rage.

The entrance of Tillie, however, had a softening effect upon him, and he greatly admired the girl's new hat, much to the glee of the office boy, who watches developements from a safe place. Mrs. Tightwad finally, tired of phoning, decided to attend the sale without her husband's permission. On her way to the store she stopped in at the office for one last effort and arrived on the scene just as Tightwad was admiring Tillie's new hat. Jumping at the conclusion that he had bought the hat for Tillie, she grabbed it from him, and, tearing it in shreds, rushed out of the office. Tillie, of course, immediately had a fit of hysterics, and poor Tightwad picked up the ruins of the hat and went out to buy her another one. He had no sooner completed his purchase when his wife entered, and, seeing him with the hat box in his hands, she grabbed it and rushed out of the store. Sheepishly he returned to the store to buy a second hat just like the other one and sadly returned to his office a wiser and a poorer man by the price of two hats instead of the one that his wife had asked for at the breakfast table.

WHAT COULD SHE DO? (Special—Three Parts—Nov. 29).—The death of her father brought Sylvia Fairfax face to face with conditions which she was unequipped to handle, and, after an unsuccessful attempt to fill the position of governess in the Windermere home, caused her to go to New York. The experiences there in a typical boarding house were varied, but thanks to Hetty Sharp, who took her under her experienced wing, Sylvia escaped the machinations of Banners, and finally secured a position in the same department store where Hetty worked.

In an effort to stop systematic thievery, the store owner had employed a detective and his suspicions fell on Sylvia. It so happened that just as Hetty had taken a handsome collar from the case she was called to the main office. Thrusting the package into Sylvia's hand, telling her to keep it until she returned, she hurried away. A few moments afterwards Sylvia was confronted by the detective, and, despite her declaration of innocence, was taken to the office of the owner and charged with robbery. The two girls were examined separately by the police inspector, and being unable to secure any evidence from Hetty, he proceeded to apply the third degree to Sylvia. In spite of all their efforts, she refused to tell who gave her the package. Hetty, listening in the next room, finally could stand it no longer, and burst into the room with a full confession which cleared Sylvia.

Struck with Sylvia's fortitude, the Inspector offered to employ her upon the force, and, as fate would have it, her first case turned out to be the abduction of little Kittie Gray. Sylvia had met Robert Gray before her misfortunes, and on discovering that it was in his home that she was to work, she prevailed upon him not to divulge her identity. Clever work enabled Sylvia to locate the abductors through the complicity of Lizzie, the maid, and after a terrific pistol fight ending in the capture of the thugs, little Kitty was restored to her mother's arms, while Robert made known Sylvia's real identity to his mother. Deciding to resign from the force, Sylvia and Robert went to the police station, and as Hetty had been released on a suspended sentence, Sylvia took the girl to her new home in an effort to make some return for Hetty's former kindness.

DICKSON'S DIAMONDS (Nov. 21).—Jimmie Coleman had dropped in to chat a while with his old friend, Felix Boyd, when they were interrupted by the entrance of a man who introduced himself as Nathan Dickson of Maiden lane. His evident desire to consult Boyd privately caused Coleman to step into an adjoining room and in a few moments Boyd was in possession of the fact that his visitor had received a letter warning him that he was in danger. The letter in itself was peculiar, having been made up entirely from separate words cut from a book. While his visitor had been talking, Boyd's attention was attracted to a heavy reading glass which protruded from his pocket, likewise to a freshly-cleaned spot on his vest. On calling Dickson's attention to these points, he seemed somewhat confused, but explained that he was very near sighted.

After giving Boyd his home address, which he wrote with the aid of the glass, he left, seemingly reassured with the detective's promise to look into the matter. When Coleman returned to the room he found Boyd at the window carefully examining the letter against the window pane. It soon became evident that the words composing the letter had been cut from a dictionary.

It was several days later that Boyd was attracted by a considerable crowd collected before a shop in Maiden lane. It turned out to be that of Dickson, and as Coleman was there, they made an examination of the premises and discovered that the safe had been robbed of its contents, and that certain traces pointed to the methods used by the burglars. To Boyd's surprise, Dickson's reading glass was found on the window sill, also certain foot prints were visible, which matched an old pair of rubbers found in one corner of the area way.

Dickson was notified, and after examining the shop, stated that his loss would amount to $200,000 and that he was ruined. Boyd's methods soon located a live trail, and he surprised Coleman by taking him on a trip to Long Island. They reached their destination at night, and, on entering an old barn, the remains of a dictionary from which words had been cut, showed Coleman that his friend's keenness was bringing them close to their quarry.

Their examination of the premises was interrupted by the entrance of a man wearing a heavy beard, whose actions seemed strangely familiar. They followed him from the barn, and were about to capture him when several men appeared upon the scene. In the fight which followed, the bearded man fell to the ground and the others escaped. Boyd and Coleman bent over him and, to the latter's surprise, it proved to be Dickson, and tight in his hand they found the package of stolen diamonds.

VITAGRAPH.

SISTERS (Nov. 16).—Unable to fight against her love, Lizzie Desmond, a factory girl, consents to elope with Tom Cassidy, a married man, whose wife is dissipated. She meets Rose Allen, a wealthy settlement worker, and tells her the whole story. Rose begs Lizzie to give Tom up, pointing out the right and wrong of the matter and telling her she can understand how hard it is as she too loves a married man, but has sent him away from her. Lizzie regards Rose as almost a Saint, and promises to send Tom away. Tom buys tickets for the West, and begs Lizzie to go with him that night. She refuses, and sends him away from her, but her love proves too strong, and she calls him back. Lizzie prepares to leave with him, but first goes to say good-bye to Rose and tell her she cannot live without Tom. While he waits on the corner, Lizzie enters the house. She expects Rose to beg her not to go with Tom, but instead, Rose says the man she loves has returned, and she is going with him that night. Lizzie is horrified, and seeing all that such a step would mean to Rose, begs her not to go, saying they will be strong and fight out the battle together. Outside, the two men grow tired of waiting. Brent thinks Rose has changed her mind after all, Tom is sure she has persuaded Lizzie to throw him over, and the two men disappointedly go their separate ways. The girls, looking from the window and seeing the men are gone, burst into sobs. Although there is such a tremendous difference in their stations in life, the sorrow of unrequited love has made them sisters, and each comforts the other, hoping that time will heal their heart-wounds and enable them to forget. They both live to rejoice in their decision.

HOPE FOSTER'S MOTHER (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 17).—Urged on by the desire to give her mother some of the luxuries of life, Hope Foster, an actress, rather timidly asks her manager for a more important role in their next production. He waives her aside, but her sincerity makes a favorable impression. Consequently, when the leading lady's artistic temperament—or plain temper—"starts things," the manager gives Hope the leading part in the new play. She is greeted affectionately by the dear old lady who rejoices in her daughter's good fortune. Mrs. Foster, although keeping it from her daughter, is on the verge of a serious illness. That night, without awakening Hope, she calls the doctor, who insists she get a trained nurse at once. Next morning Hope insists on nursing her mother herself, but Mrs. Foster will not hear of it, as that night is the opening night of the play. Hope at last gives in. The first act goes rather poorly, because of Hope's wrought-up condition. Before the second act she calls up her mother, who speaks so hopefully the girl goes back to her part in the play with a light heart. At the very moment her daughter is receiving a tremendous applause for her superb acting, her mother suffers a relapse. When she arrives home the nurse tells Hope the crisis has come. She kneels by the bedside and in a beautiful vision the sobbing girl seems to see her mother standing on the brow of a steep hill, beyond which can be seen the Eternal City. Then, her Mother-Love calling irresistibly, she turns and comes back. Hope raises her head and sees Mrs. Foster stir slightly. The nurse quickly admits the doctor, who announces that Mrs. Foster has, by some apparent miracle, safely passed the crisis.

FIXING THEIR DADS (Nov. 18).—Both deadly rivals for the hand of the Widow Hathaway, Kirkland and Livingston, gentleman farmers, are so bitter, they do all possible to break up the love match between Dick and Florence, their respective children, causing great unhappiness. Dorothy, a city friend of Florence's, arrives on a visit at the Livingston's. Seeing the two old fellows endeavoring to monopolize the fair widow's attentions, Dorothy asks what it all means. Dick and Florence tell her and she determines to help the young lovers. Florence, with a camera, hides in a doorway, and when Livingston comes by, Dorothy flirts outrageously with him with the result that they sit on a nearby bench very close together. Florence clicks the camera just as Livingston kisses Dorothy. Then they work the same scheme with Kirkland, Dorothy pretending a sprained ankle. Florence's camera snaps them with Kirkland's arms around Dorothy's waist. Then Florence threatens to show the photos to the widow. Livingston and Kirkland are forced to withdraw their objections to the marriage of their respective daughter and son. When Kirkland and Livingston again call on the widow, they are handed a letter, explaining that she has gone away with an old sweetheart; adding that she hopes they will find their happiness in that of their children whom they have foolishly tried to keep apart. Agreeing that they have been a couple of old fools, the two men shake hands, and give their hearty endorsement to the marriage of Dick and Florence. Their "dads" lose and they win.

TOO MUCH BURGLAR (Nov. 19).—An exceptionally capable girl, Trixie Joyce, proves a great help to her mother, a widow with a large family of girls. They receive a proposition from Henrietta Joyce, Mrs. Joyce's wealthy sister-in-law, to take Trixie as a companion, feed and clothe her and in place of wages, send her mother an allowance sufficient to support the rest of the family. Both realize it is the solution of a hard problem, and Trixie accepts the offer. Henrietta is close-fisted and selfish in money matters, but she also has a strain of morbidly-romantic sentiment in her nature, so the largest part of Trixie's work is reading aloud to her mistress quantities of swashbuckling, mid-Victorian novels. Trixie makes the acquaintance of Tom Perry, a young bank clerk, and the acquaintance ripens into love. Tom manages to call at the house on banking business, but tries in vain to get on the right side of Auntie. She finds him making love to Trixie, and tells the young lady she will stop the allowance if she has anything more to do with Tom, scornfully explaining, "He's no hero! There are none nowadays!" This gives the young people an idea and they arrange to have Phil, Tom's friend, break into the house as a burglar. Tom is to appear at the crucial moment and make himself a hero by "capturing" the "burglar." Unfortunately, two real burglars get into the house, so when Tom and Phil get there, they have to become genuine heroes. After a terrific struggle, they overpower the thieves and send them off to jail. Henrietta, on being released from the chair to which she has been tied up and gagged, feels convinced she has found in Tom a real hero of modern times, and resolves to keep hm in the family by consenting to his and Trixie's marriage.

THE PROFESSIONAL SCAPEGOAT (Nov. 20).—Noticing an ad reading, "Man wanted—Experienced in dismissals preferred," Arthur Wimperis who has just been discharged—feels he is well equipped for a job of that nature. He applies at Mack's big department store for the position. The superintendent tells him he requires a man to take the blame for trivial complaints made by customers—in other words—a professional scapegoat. A rehearsal is satisfactory and Arthur gets the job. He proves to be a superlative "scapegoat," and when he goes through his "weepy" motions after being "discharged" by the superintendent, the enraged customer invariably calms down and goes out feeling sorry for having caused a subordinate to lose his job. He falls in love with Enid, a beautiful salesgirl who is being pestered by the attention of a floorwalker. Delighted at her sweet sympathy, Wimperis does not tell the girl of his position in the store, but when she sees the young man "fired" several times, the joke comes out. Shortly after Wimperis and Enid have become engaged, a lawyer calls on the superintendent, inquiring for Wimperis. When sent for, the latter, by sheer force of habit, goes through his usual sorrowful business at being discharged, causing both men to roar with laughter. Wimperis then learns he is heir to a large fortune. He tells Enid and takes revenge on the floorwalker by heaving him into a pile of crockery. Arthur then stalks out of the store with Enid and they are soon made man and wife. Five years later she tells her husband that Arthur, Jr., has broken a saucer. Reprimanded, the youngster goes through the identical motions his father had performed when he was employed as a "professional scapegoat," to the great amusement of Enid and Arthur, Sr.

MARY JANE ENTERTAINS (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 21). An unexpected business meeting prevents Brown from attending a Tango Dansante at Harmony Hall, with his wife, and she, greatly disappointed, goes to her mother's for the night, leaving the house in care of Mary Jane, the maid. Percy, the grocer's clerk, calls on Mary Jane, his sweetheart, and is royally entertained by her at the Brown's expense. She finds the tango tickets and dresses up in her mistress's clothes, while Percy gets into Mr. Brown's dress-suit. They then go to the Dansante, where their comical appearance causes much amusement. Meanwhile, Mr. Brown finds he will be able to attend the dance after all, and so 'phones his wife. They find the house in awful shape, their evening clothes and tickets gone. They get a policeman and at the dance hall Brown goes in alone to look for Jane. He finds the pair drinking punch. Percy sees him coming and beats it, but is caught by Mrs. Brown and the policeman. Mary Jane, light-headed from the punch greets Brown affectionately and makes him drink some. Mrs. Brown arrives and finds her hubby and Mary Jane sitting close together, drinking from the same glass. She berates him and all are taken to court. There Brown accuses Percy of stealing his dress-suit and the young man is fined. With no money, he is about to be jailed when Mary Jane gives her last cent to liberate. Brown is taken home by his indignant wife, and poor Mary Jane, with no money, no position and scorned by Percy, feels her "entertainment" has proven a pretty costly affair.

Meniscus Bi-Convex Condensers

$4.00 Per Set COST MORE--WORTH MORE $4.00 Per Set

Did you read Mr. F. H. Richardson's—America's accepted judge and critic of perfect motion picture projection—article of a column and a quarter, devoted to Meniscus Bi-Convex Condensers, which appeared in his Projection Department, on page 638 of last week's edition of the Moving Picture World? If not, turn to this issue and read it at once—if you are a particular manager or operator and care for perfect projection.

This is not Mr. Richardson's first expression as to his opinion of the Meniscus Bi-Convex condensers. He has passed his endorsement along from time to time until it has attracted the attention of this country's best and most skillful operators, and every one who has tried out the Meniscus Bi-Convex Condensers now swears by and for them. Mr. Richardson's recommendation was given after the most rigid test by New York's greatest operators. Mr. Richardson says he accepts Mr. W. G. Woods' (General Sales Agent for Jno. H. Elbert, San Francisco), judgment with more confidence than any one other operator in the country, barring none.

Mr. Woods, together with the San Francisco Operators' Union, has given the Meniscus Bi-Convex Condensers a most rigid test and their report is that the MENISCUS Bi-Convex Condensers tried in comparison with the average COMMERCIAL condenser, selling from 50c. to $1.00, shows a wonderful advantage as to quality of picture, as well as quality of light.

Mr. J. E. Robin, General Sales Agent of the Simplex Machine, is equipping his best outfits for particular customers with these condensers. Other American machine manufacturers are doing likewise. If you want perfect projection and a far better picture than you can ever receive under any other ordinary conditions, send us your order for a set of Meniscus Bi-Convex Condensers.

Conditions abroad have not stopped our sales. We are now importing direct from Paris, the same wonderful pure white Jena France condensers—(our condensers are not made in America). Remember, we are the only American Importers and Retail Distributors handling Meniscus Bi-Convex Condensers, that we know of.

In ordering, give exact distance from machine to curtain; machine and electric current used. Also include 20c. for postage. Prompt attention to all orders.

THE MAN OF IRON (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 16).—A hard man is Lucius Stanley. Uncompromisingly upright, he lacks sympathy for characters weaker than his own. Thus, when his son John asks for money with which to pay some debts, the stern father refuses the boy's request.

John is to inherit a fortune on his twenty-fifth birthday. Hard pressed, the boy takes money from his father's safe, salving his conscience by promising to return it when he receives his inheritance. Stanley discovers the theft. Despite the pleas of his wife and their daughter Margery, the father sends his son to jail.

A year later, John spurns his father's advances. Discharged from prison, the boy hastens to New York. The blow prostrates Mr. Stanley. Margery quarrels with her father, blaming him for the change that has taken place in John. As the result, the girl leaves home.

Proceeding to New York, Margery vainly endeavors to secure a position. John, meanwhile, is squandering his fortune in riotous living. Margery, failing to find a position as a chorus girl, excites the sympathy of a couple of actresses. They later invite her to accompany them to a dinner party. John is to be the host.

Ignorant of this, Margery accompanies the girls. Thus, brother and sister meet. Unaware of the circumstances, John is appalled to find Margery in the company of his shady friends. The boy takes her to his apartments.

While he learns her story, John receives a letter which warns him to come home if he desires to save his mother's life. Brother and sister start homeward. They arrive in time to hear their father's tearful admission that his stern conduct has caused the misery which has beset him. The girl becomes a religious worker.

Reynolds is discharged from prison. Filled with thirst for revenge, he hunts Manning down. Just as he is about to slay the man, he learns of what Beatrice has done. Later, Manning, Reynolds and Joe find Beatrice working for the people in the slums. Together they start life anew.

The railway company is notified that as the result of their negligence in allowing a banana peel to repose near their tracks, Fatty has sustained everything from paralysis to dandruff.

When the case comes up for trial, Fatty is brought into court on a stretcher. His pitiful plight, made much of by Attorney Steel, moves every person in court to tears. The railroad doctor brings an electric battery. Declaring that a paralytic cannot feel an electric current, he gives poor Fatty every volt in the battery.

With a howl, the "paralyzed" man bounds out of the stretcher and makes a bee line for home. Every person in the court room, from the judge to the attendant, follows. They catch Fatty just as he reaches his home. The man saves himself, however, by declaring he has been cured by the shock.

The following day, Fatty receives a letter from the railway company. It is a bill for $500 which the company declares is due them for having cured him of paralysis. Lawyer Steel enters the house just then. Aided by his wife, Fatty hurls him into the street. But the worst is still to come. Steel's rival, Gouge, passes by. Observing Steel's predicament, Gouge adds insult to injury by standing over his rival and jeering.

But Helen, who is still to meet the man she is to wed, slowly shakes her head in refusal. Her next adventure is released Saturday, Nov. 28.

ESSANAY.

COUNTESS SWEEDIE (Nov. 16).—Countess Von Swatt goes on a slumming party and loses one of her calling cards in the "hash house" where Sweedie works. Sweedie finds the card. Next day an invitation to a ball to be given by Mr. Wealth is delivered by Sweedie by mistake. She has an idea; she will go to the ball and pretend to be the countess. The night of the party, Sweedie arrives at the Wealth home accompanied by a waiter from her place of employment. She is introduced to the waiting guests as the Countess Von Swatt and in the middle of the introduction, stubs her toe and falls down the stairs. She is paid great attention by all present and they insist upon her demonstrating the latest dances. Sweedie and the waiter are in the midst of the Sweedish tango when the real countess arr[illegible] seeing her the pair make a rush for the door, but are captured and spend the night in jail. Sweedie happy that she was a countess for a while anyway.

THE SERVANT QUESTION (Nov. 17).—Ellen, an heiress, becomes tired of living an idle life, so applies for a position as maid to Mrs. Newlyrich. She is accepted. The following day she is seen by a wealthy Baron as she runs out to mail a letter. He is infatuated and next morning when he reads an ad for a chef in the same household, he applies and is engaged. That evening Lord and Lady Montford are to be the guests for dinner. The Baron makes a miserable attempt at cooking, and after the second course the butler is given orders to discharge the chef. The enraged Baron enters the dining room, where he is recognized by Lord Montford, and at the same moment Ellen enters and is given a hearty welcome by Lady Montford. The Baron is given a formal introduction to Ellen, and the four depart to get a square meal.

THE FABLE PROVING THAT SPONGERS ARE FOUND IN A DRUG STORE (Nov. 18).—Once there was a good natured old Scout who opened a drug store on the corner with the intention of making money enough to buy bird seed once in a while. The first Gink who blew in wanted to know the correct time, and not a cent's worth did he buy. The next was one of those hurry-up guys who wanted a city directory and wanted to know if Murphy was spelled with an "F." Shortly after Estelle came in and wanted to wait for Laura. She was dying for a drink of plain water, she couldn't drink soda water because the gas got up her nose. Finally, when Laura came she bought a postage stamp, and not having any pennies, said she'd be in later to pay for it. She wanted a free almanac. The next chap wanted a light and all he spent was his time. A Hick wanted to hang a lithograph in the window for a show that didn't give passes. Still the cash register slumbered on. Finally a live wire came in with a prescription, and the books at the end of the day showed a profit of $1,76. Wonderful business that man did. Moral: Don't blame the apothecary. He has to play even.

A HORSE ON SOPHIE (Nov. 19).—Sophie writes a note to her aunt telling her that she is undecided whether she will marry Slippery Slim or Mustang Pete, but says she will accept the one who buys the best-looking horse. Slim intercepts the note and immediately goes to the Deacon, who owns the finest horses in town. He buys the Deacon's prize steed, but when he attemps to drive him, the animal refuses to move an inch. In the meantime Mustang has heard of Sophie's plan, so he also goes to the Deacon and buys a horse. This one refuses to go forward and takes Mustang for a nerve-racking ride traveling backwards. Slim and Mustang trade horses, each thinking that he is putting it over on the other. When the two rivals discover that both horses are "lemons" they proceed to mix in a fistic encounter. While they are fighting the Deacon comes along, helps Sophie in his buggy and drives away.

BRONCHO BILLY'S SCHEME (Nov. 21).—Colonel Emmett's daughter is captured by an outlaw who blindfolds her just before taking her to his hut, so, in case she escaped, she would be unable to lead anybody to his rendezvous. She is told by one of his accomplices that he intends forcing her into marriage, so she feigns illness. While the outlaw goes for a doctor, she writes a note saying that she is not ill, and is being held for ransom. The outlaw arrives with Broncho Billy, the doctor, whom he has also blindfolded. The girl slips him the note and he pretends to be attending her. Before being blindfolded again for the return journey he fills his pocket with white pills, which he drops at intervals, marking the trail. He then notifies the sheriff who, follows the trail and rescues the girl after his men have overpowered the gang.

THE MEANS AND THE END (Special—Two Parts—Nov. 20).—William D. Hildebrand, a trust magnate and capitalist, though not naturally a tyrant, has been so engrossed in his schemes to make money and build up great enterprises that he oppresses the people. Vincent Archer, a Sociological worker, learns from his uncle on his death bed that he and Hildebrand were responsible for the death of a man. He uses this means to gain his end in building a model tenement house district for the poor. He forces Hildebrand, on the threat of exposure, to give the money while he and his secretary put the schemes through.

Hildebrand's daughter, Helene, becomes intensely interested in the work and finally falls in love with Archer. Hildebrand himself, after he has got into the enterprise, becomes interested and experiences a change of heart. But another man knows of the slaying, a Jim Parker of the underworld. He threatens to expose Hildebrand. Archer goes to Parker and, while he is recovering from a spree, takes the evidence away from him and burns it up.

Parker goes to his office and almost kills Archer in a terrific battle. Helene takes Archer flowers while he is recovering and visits him frequently. While he is in love with her, yet he does not propose, because their stations in life are so far apart. Archer comes to the conclusion that he was not justified in forcing money from Hildebrand, even for a good cause. He writes him to this effect and says that he is going to leave the city. But Helene, hearing that he is going away, goes to him and asks him frankly if he does not care for her. This breaks down the barrier and he tells her he loves her more than anything else in life. Hildebrand then tells Archer the circumstances of the killing, which was in self-defense.

SELIG.

IF I WERE YOUNG AGAIN (Special Two Parts Nov. 16).—Aged Jonathan Wise is head Curator of the department of Anthropology in the great museum at X..... He has a considerable fortune saved in the bank, and when Director Henshaw, head of the institution, jokingly shows him an advertisement of a brokerage firm which claims to make investors wealthy, the aged Curator shakes his head and replies, that if he were young again he would venture his savings in such an enterprise.

The day following a shipment containing a mummy arrives from Egypt to the museum, and while examining this new addition to his treasures, Professor Wise discovers among the bandages a vial containing a liquid, and on the vial is an inscription in ancient characters which the Professor quickly translates, reading as follows: "One drop with each new moon brings back youth." Professor Wise secretes the vial on his person and takes it to his room. He pours a few drops on a withered plant which reposes in his window seat and is astounded to witness the immediate rejuvenation of the plant.

The next day he goes to the bank, draws out his accumulated savings and that night, seeing that the moon is still new, he swallows a few drops of the magic liquid. A glance at the mirror shows him revealed again as a young man. Then the various problems in connection with his sudden change of appearance present themselves. Not wishing to explain to his landlady his sudden change from old age to youth he packs some necessary articles in his valise, and stealing silently to the door, rings the bell, and upon the appearance of the landlady, announces himself in search of lodgings. The landlady shows him to a room across the hall from his own room.

He visits the promoters of the Mexican oil stocks, which he has seen advertised and unhesitatingly turns over all his available cash in exchange for beautifully printed stock certificates. He finds much enjoyment in visiting various places of public interest where he comes among acquaintances, who, however, do not realize that the sprightly looking young man in their immediate vicinity is good old Professor Wise.

Director Henshaw of the museum is much perturbed in spirit by the sudden and unaccountable disappearance of the Curator. He notifies the police and an article is printed in the newspapers, giving a few known facts in connection with his mysterious disappearance. Professor Wise reads the newspaper article and chuckles over the mystery which his transformation has occasioned. In his own room upon glancing through the columns of the newspaper which tells the story of his disappearance, he is horrified and shocked to read an account of the swindling operations of the promoters who sold to him shares in the alleged Mexican oil wells. His fortune is gone and he finds is necessary to begin at once to recuperate his losses by obtaining employment. He answers advertisements in the newspapers, but is rejected in one instance because of his apparent youth, and another advertiser declares that he wants only stylish young men, glancing disapprovingly at the well-made but old-fashioned garments worn by the transformed professor. Finally, after many fruitless endeavors, he obtains employment in the museum as a clerk in the department built up and conducted by himself. The salary, however, is but a small part of that which he received as Curator.

Wishing to obtain some necessar articles from his own room, he enters the chamber surreptiously and the landlady eat hes him, as she thinks, intruding upon the premises of the absent lodger. She demands the reason for his intrusion, and he finally confesses to her that he is none other than the late Professor Wise, who has been transformed by a magic liquor from an old man to his present appearance. She is astounded, but withal delighted. The landlady has recently come into an extensive fortune and has expressed a wish that she might become younger in order to enjoy the benefits of unlimited money. The professor has discouraged her, but when he exhibits the mysterious vial and explains to her that it contains additional quantities of the magic fluid, she frantically begs him to permit her to taste the contents and become youthful again. The experiences of Professor Wise in his transformed condition have been so fruitless and so bitter that he counsels her earnestly to refrain from making such an experiment. She insists and he finds it necessary to eject her from the room. He believes that no good can come from the continued existence of the contents of the magic vial. So he pours the remainder of the contents into an open dish and sets fire to the liquid. It burns for a few seconds while the pungent fumes pervade the atmosphere. He is overcome and falls into an easy chair. Upon awakening he finds himself returned to his previous condition.

The landlady is overjoyed to find him again in his natural stage of life. He returns to the museum and takes up again his work as Curator after astonishing the director beyond words by his brief explanation. He states that he has been on a long journey in which he lost everything and gained nothing. The landlady gives him her hand in marriage and he thereby recuperates his lost fortune.

THE SHERIFF'S REWARD (Nov. 17).—Rose Boland, a pretty young ranch owner, quarrels with her foreman because she dislikes his attentions. She discharges him from her employ, and her cowboys eject him from the ranch. The disgruntled foreman proceeds to join a band of cattle rustlers and engages with them in the looting of cattle.

One day while Rose is making a tour of inspection on horseback, the rustlers, who have been lying in wait, make her a prisoner. They bind and gag her, and lock her up in an isolated cabin. The boys of the ranch go in search of her and notify the sheriff that she has disappeared. The sheriff has cast eyes at Rose in the past and is all eagerness to find her. Alone, he rides up to the deserted cabin, having trailed her by a handkerchief which she cleverly dropped in the pathway, as a clue. The rustlers wound him when he tries to make prisoners of them, and they escape temporarily. The cowboys ride up, release Rose, and she nurses the sheriff back to life and strength. The rustles are dealt with according to the traditions of western law. The sheriff gets his reward by making a prisoner of Rose's heart.

THE BROKEN "X" (Nov. 18).—Tradition still tells of the band of bank burglars who terrorized Marysville twenty years ago. It is supposed that they have been completely dispersed, but one dark night the Marysville bank vault is looted of an enormous sum in currency and the burglars escape. In the darkness three men, Phillip Elliott, mayor of a neighboring town, Ed. Stanley and "Bull" Ames enter the Marysville hotel by way of the fire escape and divide the bank loot. All are well known and no suspicion is attached to them. The local police find themselves unable to solve the mystery. Secret Service agents are called in and proceed cleverly to trace various clues.

Stanley, who is a morphine fiend, is traced through a $1,000 bill, and the two other burglars are finally rounded up by the Secret Service agents. Stanley escapes the penalty of the law by accidentally taking an overdose of morphine. A former member of the old "X" gang revenges himself for past treachery upon Elliott and Ames by identifying them as the remains of that famous band of burglars—the "X" gang. They go to prison for long terms.

THE MYSTERIOUS BLACK BOX (Nov. 20).—Bill, a lazy fellow employed in the shipping department of Fogg's wholesale house, is in love with Fogg's pretty daughter, Betty. Fogg is stingy with his wife and will not clothe her according to her station, although he is generous to Betty. Fogg catches Bill loafing on the job and fires him. While getting his pay envelope, Fogg's stenographer stumbles and strikes her head against a desk. Fogg picks her up and Bill, lunch-box in hand, makes an exclamation which leads Fogg to believe earnestly that Bill has taken a snapshot of the scene.

Bill has a photograph of Betty and himself, who have just been married secretly. The pair make reference to this photograph in such a way that Fogg believes Bill intends to show Mrs. Fogg a photograph of the scene in the office. Fogg bribes everybody, including his astonished wife, with bountiful presents, and discovers finally that Bill had a lunch-box instead of a camera.

HER SACRIFICE (Nov. 21).—Tom, a fisherman, and his sister live in a quiet village by the seashore. Kitty lives with her dad in a neighboring cottage, while Bill, the sweetheart of Kitty, earns his living by fishing with Tom and Kitty's dad. Bill and Kitty are engaged to be wed and the happiness of the young lovers is unclouded until suspicions are aroused that Bill has won the simple heart of Tom's little sister, who has returned his passion without a thought of the consequences. The little fisher-maiden becomes horror stricken when she discovers the consequences of her love with Bill, and beseeches him to protect her from the village gossip by making her his wife.

Bill's affair with the little fisher-maiden has been a pastime, for he dearly loves Kitty. Tom discovers the facts in the case and attempts to take the life of Bill, but Kitty interferes, prevents the penalty of revenge and resigns her sweetheart to the little fisher-maiden; while her own heart is torn with anguish. Bill, realizing the full consequence of his unmanly treatment of the little fisher-maiden, returns to her, begs forgiveness and they are married.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO. 70 (Oct. 29).—In this section are shown the first pictures taken after the bombardment of Rheims. This film was made by a Hearst-Selig camera man after he had received a special permit from the French Government. An occasional shell was still falling among the ruins when the intrepid operator began cranking his machine. One section of the film shows a falling wall caused by the bursting of a 25-pound shell within a half block of the operator.

The early press reports, to the effect that the Cathedral had been destroyed by the bombardment, are belied by the pictures which show that the Cathedral suffered comparatively little from the bursting shells. War section concludes with actual firing-line scenes showing Belgian artillery in action on the outskirts of Antwerp and refugees fleeing toward the city.

Among the interesting domestic scenes are the motor boat race on Lake Erie, when Disturber IV broke the world's record; the launching of the Great Northern coastwise steamship at Cramp ship yards, Philadelphia, which is an exceptional picture in view of the fact that the boat strikes the water on the side and narrowly misses capsizing; New York physicians, including a woman surgeon, sailing for the war zone; and election scenes throughout the country which includes pictures of Governor Glynn and Col. Roosevelt.

COLUMBUS.

A FAMILY INTERMINGLE (Nov. 10).—Bob Noble, while attending college at Boneville, meets May Brock and learns that they both come from Piketown. While their children are at college, Mrs. Noble and Mr. Brock meet and get married, not telling each other that each has a child. Bob is requested by his mother to send her mail in future care of general delivery, and under no circumstances to come home without notifying her first. Surprised at this, Bob decides to go home and investigate. He leaves a letter for May, telling her he is going home. She, thinking his love false, decides to follow on the next train. Arriving at Piketown, Bob learns of his mother's marriage and goes to see her at Mr. Brock's house. He is rudely pushed into a room by his mother, but not in time to prevent Mr. Brock seeing a strange man with his wife. Mr. Brock is very angry, and his wife, being afraid to tell him it is her son, leaves the room. Much to his surprise, his daughter arrives and the tables are turned—Mrs. Broeck sees her husband with a strange woman. Mr. and Mrs. Brock have a real argument, deciding to separate. The children then appear and everything is explained satisfactorily.

THE PHANTOM CRACKSMAN (Nov. 17).—Big Robbery. Watchman Cloroformed. Supposed to be the work of the notorious criminal, the Phantom Cracksman," read this newspaper article. It was a big joke at the police headquarters and the joke was on Nolan, who had sworn he would capture this elusive crook. It was the talk of all the clubs. Mr. Brandt, of the Republican Club, sneered at what he called the inefficiency of the police. "I'd like to see him rob my house," was the last remark as he left the club that evening.

A few hours later the joke was on him. Notwithstanding his elaborate system of burglar alarms, "The Phantom Cracksman" walked in and cleaned out his safe while he was dozing on a chair in the adjoining room. The police and press were soon on the scene and also some of his friends from the club. The police pointed out that the burglar had entered through a window which was fairly obvious, as Mr. Brandt had seen him go out that way, and the garden path below showed evidences of bad markmanship. Brandt was getting worked up into a rage. The reporters made notes, but no one seemed to do anything.

A few weeks later he was robbed again and this time he caught a glimpse of the Phantom Cracksman's face. He was surprised to find that it was the face of a woman. It was months before he saw her again, this time as a woman of fashion, who knew how to spend this money lavishly and artistically. Controlling himself with an effort, he sent the hotel clerk for the police and addressed her. As she turned to flee he seized her by the wrist. Two or three flashes from her eyes and one or two pleading remarks and he was on her side and ready to stand between her and the police.

But the wages of sin- she died in his arms with a bullet in her lungs.

POWERS.

NAN O' THE HILLS (Nov. 6).—Nan Walsh, keeper of a restaurant in a small mining town, is engaged to marry Bob Davis, a young prospector. True to her expectations, Bob makes good and uncovers a vein of rich pay ore. He hastens to tell Nan. She accompanies him back to the scene of his operations. Arriving there, they find that the claim has been jumped in their absence and that the law, in the person of a constable, is protecting the rights of the claim-jumper.

Despondent over this incident, Bob hits upon a plan to reap at least part of the fruit of his labors. Not wishing to hurt anyone in the operation, he extracts the bullets from the cartridges in his revolver and sallies forth to hold up the wagon upon which the claim-jumper is sending a load of ore for shipment to the railroad.

Unfortunately for Bob, Jim Haswell, sheriff of the county, is riding in the vicinity. Drawing his revolver, he wings the would-be hold-up. He then gathers a posse and sets out to capture Bob.

Bob, foiled in his attempt, seeks refuge in Nan's restaurant. When all ruses fail to convince the sheriff that Bob is not there, she recalls to him an affair in which she was instrumental in saving his life. Confronted with this page from the past, the sheriff rides away with his posse. Thus, Nan saves her lover from capture and, together, they watch the former pursuers fade away into the distance.

101 BISON.

THE JUNGLEMASTER (Two Parts—Nov. 7).—Roselli, a circus owner, accompanied by his daughter, Marie, and her fiancee, Clifford, arrive in Jorgeburg, Africa, where Roselli expects to purchase animals for his menagerie. Paul, a hunter and trapper, witnesses their arrival and, himself a white man, invites them to his kraal, which is also his headquarters for captured beasts. Later, Paul invites them to inspect his menagerie.

In a cage, somewhat isolated from the others, is a lioness. Paul warns the visitors against the beast, but Roselli advances toward the animal. It immediately becomes calm. To further demonstrate his strange power of control, the circus owner enters the cage, takes from the lioness her cub, and hands the little fellow to Marie. Their astonishment over, the party returns to Paul's house.

That evening, while seated about the fire, Roselli relates how and when he first discovered that he possessed his strange power over wild animals. Paul, impressed, offers to guide Roselli into the jungle. His offer is accepted, and the following morning finds them all en route, except Marie.

The venture is a success; several wild beasts are added to an already large collection. Marie, piqued at her father's refusal to permit her to accompany them into the depths of the jungle, mounts her horse and rides off. Once in the jungle she encounters a leopard—she is thrown from her horse. Paul rescues her after killing the beast, and brings her back to camp. The fascinating Marie has unwittingly created in Paul a feeling stronger than admiration. Paul declares himself to the girl, but is refused. Disappointed, Paul takes his troubles to his mother, who does her best to calm the hot-headed young man. Later, Paul and Clifford have words.

Unknown to his guests, Paul is a heavy drinker; moreover, he possesses an ungovernable temper. In revenge for Marie's refusal of him, he watches until he is certain that Marie has the lion cub in her room. Then he releases the old lioness. The beast follows the trail of her cub, jumps through the window, and is only prevented from killing the girl by the timely arrival of Roselli, who again gives a demonstration of his strange power. Continuing his debauch, Paul again endeavors to use the lion to further his revenge, and is finally killed as a consequence.

GOLD SEAL.

THE OPENED SHUTTERS (Four Parts—Nov. 17).—When the story opens Sylvia Lacey has been left an orphan. Her shiftless father, Sam Lacey, of artistic, but weak nature, left her without money. Her mother had died ten years before. The girl writes to her only remaining relatives, an aunt, Miss Martha Lacey, and her mother's brother. In his youth the Judge—Calvin Trent wanted to marry Miss Martha, but they quarreled. When Sylvia's letter arrives, announcing that she will be in Boston the next day, both uncle and aunt are nonplussed. Neither wants the responsibility. Miss Martha finally decides to go and the Judge sends his young partner, John Dunham, in his place.

Miss Martha waits with the young lawyer in the hotel parlor. Plainly she speaks her mind to John about the inconveniences of the girl's coming. Sylvia is already in the room and hears. She promptly refuses any aid from either relatives. Miss Martha is sorry, but it is too late. Dunham, however, goes back to the girl and forces her to accept a loan (of Judge's money).

Back in the village, Miss Martha and the Judge both remember a cousin of the Judge's who manages the Judge's main farm. "Thinkright" is sent for and his white hair and kindly eyes soon win the girl to visit him. "Thinkright" once loved Sylvia's mother and is naturally drawn toward the girl.

As she and "Thinkright" reach the Mill Farm near Portland, she sees the deserted old Tide Mill with all its shutters closed. Imaginative, she says then and always after, that the old mill is sorrowing and only love can open the shutters. Edna Derwent, a rich Boston girl, who owns a cottage on a nearby island, is a friend and disciple of "Thinkright's." He has taught her to be patient with the false social life which means so much to her mother. Each summer she comes to Hawk Island with Miss Lacey as chaperon. Sylvia becomes jealous of Edna and all her beauty, charm and wealth. "Thinkright" stops this trend of thought in the girl and after several severe tussles, turns her thoughts into the right road. She struggles bravely. Her uncle, penitent, arrives and promptly falls in love with this niece he has never seen before. She forgives him. The next day Miss Lacey arrives at Hawk Island with Edna. This forgiveness is harder, but Sylvia, strong in her new right thinking, manages it. She is invited to the Derwent cottage for a visit.

John Dunham, an old friend of Edna's, comes for a visit and his fancy is quickly taken with the imaginative Sylvia whom he rescued in Boston the month before. Sylvia has a strong talent for painting. She has done some things with pencil, but longs for paint. She has no money and is too proud to ask any of her relatives. In her heart she adores John Dunham, but has held herself coldly toward him because she thought that he and Edna were engaged. Suddenly she discovers that he loves her. In her embarrassment she drops her book of sketches and "Thinkright" finds pieces of brown paper covered with drawings, all showing much power and talent. Edna leagues Judge Trent in a plan, and Sylvia learns that she is to have lessons in painting.

The winter passes. Sylvia is making rapid strides in her profession under Edna's special wing in Boston. Summer comes and she goes to the Mill Farm again for a visit. Walking alone on the edge of the basin, she sees the shutters of the Tide Mill have opened and the windows are gleaming brightly. Just then John Dunham appears and asks her to go with him to the Tide Mill. It is open. The first floor is vacant and so is the second. He asks her to go clear to the top and there she finds a luxuriantly appointed artist's studio.

"Love opened the shutters," says John. "I bought the Mill and furnished this for my bride." "The old story is told and the shutters of life open wide for the girl who learned to think right."

FRONTIER.

THE GIRL FROM TEXAS (Nov. 7).—Fred, a lawyer and real estate agent in a frontier town, receives a letter that Miss Edythe Sterling, of Dallas, Texas, will shortly call on him. He is to give her all assistance possible as to purchasing a suitable ranch.

Edythe arrives. Several weeks pass. She decides on a ranch and Fred makes arrangements for its owner to be out at the place that afternoon. Edythe, who is somewhat a ventriloquist, imitates the sound of a rattlesnake and gives Fred a bad scare.

Two crooks, recently released from jail, have sworn to "get" Fred, who, they claim, railroaded them. They have taken up their abode at the deserted ranch that Edythe has chosen. A holdup occurs. The victim rides in for the sheriff.

Fred and Edythe arrive at the ranch. While waiting, he proposes to her, but is rejected. Fred decides to ride down to the nearest ranch house and again 'phone to the ranch owner, which he does.

The two crooks return to the shack. Edythe, terrified, takes refuge in the closet. Fred returns and the two crooks find that they have in their power the man they have sworn to "get." About to shoot him, Edythe, in the closet, has a sudden inspiration; she imitates the sizz of a rattlesnake. When the two crooks jump, she emerges and gains the upper hand. The sheriff and his posse appear. The ranch owner also appears. The sale is concluded. Fred, looking over the deed, discovers that it has been made out in his name. He soon knows the reason why.

MAN TO MAN (Nov. 21).—When Fred, the sheriff of Tulare County, receives word that his younger brother, across the line in Inyo County, has been elected sheriff, he entrusts affairs with his deputies and starts over to offer his congratulations.

Jay, the defeated candidate for sheriff, picks a quarrel with Jack, the younger sheriff. He snatches Jack's gun, and cooly insults him. Jack grabs Jay's gun and draws on him. Jay calls attention to the fact that he is shooting in self-defence. When the elder brother arrives he finds his brother dead, and he is prevented from shooting Jay by bystanders who tell him that Jay only protected himself. Jay leaves. Fred examines the gun in Jack's hand, which Jack had snatched from Jay. Finding it empty, he at once realizes that his brother met death through a deliberate murder. He informs the bystanders that he intends to avenge his brother's death if he has to follow Jay to perdition. The man hunt begins.

Into the desert the two men go. A sand storm comes up. Both lose their horses. Days pass. Reduced to his last shell Fred fires—only to miss. Jay sees him throw away his gun and starts for him. Fred is helpless from weakness. Jay kicks and curses him and edges off with his gun covering him. He, too, has expended his ammunition. Knife in hand, Jay starts for him, and with the strength of a cornered beast the sheriff wards him off. The death struggle begins. When the sun sets the sheriff stands over the man—his oath of vengeance fulfilled.

THE STAR GAZER (Nov. 3).—The star gazer is an aged astronomer, who earns a meagre living for himself and his daughter with his telescope, at five cents per look. His daughter falls in love with a newspaper reporter. They become engaged. The matter of a trousseau on a slender purse troubles them. The father endeavors to raise money by securing a second mortgage on their home. He fails.

During his absence his daughter cleans house. While polishing with kerosene oil, a fire breaks out in the room. Its furnishings are burned. A fireman, after putting out the blaze, discovers a charred rag, saturated with kerosene. He becomes suspicious. So the next day when the old man comes to collect his fire insurance, he is accused of arson and arrested. The reporter visits the house and finds a fireman on watch. A fresh fire breaks out and the reporter, on looking for the cause, discovers a ray of sun, reflected through the telescope, focused at a small spot on the dry floor. It smoulders and ignites, thus proving that the original fire was caused in the same manner.

The old man is released. He secures his fire insurance and the daughter thus gets her trousseau.

Bess takes Eddie into her room for a chat. Lee, returning, sees them enter the room. He is about to break in when Vic. comes from her room and recognizes Lee as an old school-friend. He thereupon goes into Vic.'s room and is seen by Eddie, who has just come out of his sister's room. Eddie then tries to peep through the key-hole. The house detective comes upon him and orders him downstairs. Lee comes out of Vic.'s room and rushes to his own room and is in the act of listening at the door, when the house detective orders him away. Both girls then go in search for their husbands. Eddie returns and finds his wife gone. Bess returning, meets her brother and they again go into her room, just as Eddie's wife comes around the corner of the hall, and sees her husband enter a room with another girl.

New complications arise between the two bridal couples and the house detective; both brides and bridegroom are arrested. The police judge becomes so muddled in trying to understand the relationship of the quartette that he lets them all go. Explanations and a reconciliation ensue.

A FRIEND IN NEED (Nov. 22).—Josie, a girl brought up in poverty and want, is the sole comfort of her widowed mother. When the latter is suddenly stricken ill, the child is almost frantic. She renders her all the aid possible, but the doctor who attends the woman says that she must have a certain kind of medicine and a little wine or she will not live.

The heartbroken Josie races to the drug store with the prescription, but is roughly turned away by the druggist when he finds she has no money. She goes out on the street and narrowly escapes being knocked down by the hurrying crowd who have but little thought for the child's trouble. Pausing in front of a fruit stand, she is moved on by an Italian peddler, who turns to wait on a messenger boy who has left his bicycle on the curb. In a flash Josie makes up her mind and seizing the bicycle rides madly off. Stopping at the first bicycle store and after some persuasion the man gives her $5.00 for the wheel. Purchasing the medicine and wine, she races home. Meanwhile, the messenger boy discovers the theft of his wheel. He points out Josie as the thief. The officer is about to take her when she explains. Although the boy wants him to take her away, he allows her ten minutes grace. Entering the room, the child gets the medicine ready and proceeds to her mother's bed only to find she is dead. At this moment the policeman indicates that the ten minutes are up and the messenger starts to rush in. The policeman stops him and gently opening the door sees a sad tableau. Taking in the situation at a glance the man in uniform pays the messenger boy.

The maid calls her father, who calls a real doctor. The doctor tastes the poison and gives Nellie a glass of medicine. Charlie arrives and tips the maid so she will not give away their scheme. He fixes his false beard and enters. The real doctor, becoming indignant, leaves the house. Nellie begs her father to send for Charlie as she is going to die. O! YOU MUMMY (Nov. 17).—The long-watched-for mummy arrives at the museum. The professor is so elated. Meanwhile, his niece is being entertained by her beau, whom he strongly objects. Hearing her uncle is coming, she has Harry climb into the davenport. Her aunt and uncle enter and the latter speaks about the mummy. Harry, who is suffocating, begins to yell; the professor is alarmed and looks around. Slowly the lid of the davenport raises and Harry peeks out, the professor discovers him and yanks him out. He orders him out of the house.e

Arriving at the mummy's case the professor is surprised to learn that the mummy is alive; she walks out to him and soon is making love to him. He leaves the room to get a drink. She immediately exits. Returning, the professor is alarmed to find his mummy gone; he runs to the street. The professor's tale of his loss is soon related and Mabel discovers his mummy.

"NEWMAN" Brass Frames and Rails

There are no two ways about it. "NEWMAN" products are at the pinnacle in quality. Since the first day they were introduced, they steadily grew more and more popular. Exhibitors everywhere came—they saw—and were conquered. For they were quick to see that metal frames were best for lobby display use. That under variable weather conditions "NEWMAN FRAMES" were unaffected. That no matter how they were banged around "NEWMAN FRAMES" looked as good as new. And best of all, they were convinced that "NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES" make the most attractive and the most appropriate means of showing off their posters and photos, that have ever been put on the market.

All of this, coupled together, is the simple reason why 80% of all metal frames in use in theatres throughout the entire world are "NEWMANS." We were the first to conceive the idea that exhibitors would appreciate a frame with all of these merits, and the answer is, "NEWMAN" QUALITY.

YOU, MR. EXHIBITOR, who believe that those old weather beaten wood frames are good enough, don't realize that an attractive lobby display is your best asset. Make this the day to write in for our new 1914 catalog—a complete directory of lobby display ideas.

TRAFFIC IN BABIES (Nov. 22).—Jack Hardy, a wealthy young bachelor, loves Ann Farris, daughter of a banker. He is proposing to her when a note arrives from her father, saying he is to be arrested for embezzling and has committed suicide rather than face the disgrace. Ann sends Jack away and takes a position as nurse in a family going to Europe, rather than have her lover burdened with the shadow of her father's act.

Two years elapse. Fate picks Katie O'Brien to bring the lovers together. Katie, whose mother is a washwoman, tends the baby in the street. While she is in the residential section she meets a pretty but weary looking nurse girl, tending a baby boy. The nursegirl admits that she doesn't like caring for the baby. Katie remembers.

Later, Katie's charge is saved from drowning in a sewer ditch by a strange young man. This young man playfully offers to buy the baby for fifty cents. Katie refuses, but says she knows where she can get a baby for him. The young man gives her fifty cents. Katie, watching her chance, manages to carry off the baby which Ann has charge of. She deposits the infant in the young man's apartment and departs to buy a kewpie doll.

Jack, for he is the strange young man, returns from his walk and is much amused to find the baby. The valet has awakened and is much disturbed. After a romp with it, Jack reports the affair to the police. It is when Ann comes to identify the lost baby that she meets her former sweetheart. Incidentally Ann decides she doesn't want to hide any longer and is quite willing to become Jack's wife.

JOKER.

TWO PALS AND A GAL (Nov. 7).—One-Eyed Al and "Coyote Kid" breeze into Gulchville with six months' pay all in one lump. Kid and Al are life-long pals, ready at any time "ter wade through melted lead if 'twould save the other's skin." But this brotherly affection is rudely shattered when they strike Gulchville. The cause of this shattering, as usual, is a woman—one Widow Clemon, who conducts a hash-house. Both fall in love with this lady.

Widow Clemon has long deplored the lack of business. She welcomes their trade. Accepting their love, or returning it, is another matter. When they venture to propose marriage to her, she promptly throws them out. They, however, do not lose hope.

In the town is a cunning shyster lawyer, nicknamed "Hearse." Al and Kid seek this lawyer's advice as to how best to make the widow love them. "Hearse" sees the size of their payrolls and schemes with the widow to secure it. He advises Kid and Al to make the hash-house owner jealous. They readily fall for this advice, bringing a flock of dancehall girls to the hash-house for a grand blow-out. They then spend their money like water, endeavoring to make the widow jealous.

She carries along her part of the scheme, and seemingly is enraged because of Kid and Al's attentions to the girls. She keeps this up with great success, until all their six months' hard-earned pay is transferred to her cash drawer. Then Kid and Al, each nursing the surety that the widow is properly wrenched with heart pangs, and ready to fall on their necks to plead her love, receive a rude awakening when "Hearse" shows up jubilant.

HIS NIGHT OUT (Nov. 18).—Ernie, who is in love with Betty, has trouble in seeing her owing to her father, who objects strenuously. Father, catching them in an embrace, tells the ardent wooer he is not the man for his daughter; he is a weakling; and wants a man of force for his daughter.

Ernie seeks consolation at the club and becomes intoxicated. In this condition Ernie is interested in the prehistoric decoration on the wall. Leaving the club, he falls asleep on some stone steps, where he dreams of being in the primeval period, where he is in love with Betty. Another leader of the primitive men is trying to steal his intended bride. A war ensues in which he displays skill and recovers her. In embrace he is awakened by a policeman.

The dream has given Ernie added courage. He goes to his sweetheart's house that evening, intent on kidnapping her. He gets in the wrong room and carries father out, discovering his mistake in the lower hall. He shoves father out

HIS TRYSTING PLACE (Two Parts—Nov. 9).—Clarence in the bosom of his family is absentminded and restless. He tips over the boiling soup upon himself, carries the baby "old cat" fashion by the scruff of his little rompers, falls into the infant's cradle and commits numerous other breaks so that Mabel, his pretty wife, is distracted. At last he decides to go down town, announcing that on his return he will bring a present for little Peter. Stopping at a drug store he purchases the latest innovation in nursing bottles and then goes into a cafe where dinner is served for a quarter.

Meanwhile Ambrose takes leave of his adoring wife to go on one of his periodical strolls. He has an appointment with Clarice, the pretty telephone girl in the hall of his apartment house, to meet her in the park, and as he passes, she hands him a note stating the hour and precise location of the trysting place. This he slips into his pocket with an affectionate wink—and takes his way to the twenty-five cent eating place to kill time before the rendezvous. Here he and Clarence accost one another side by side at the counter, and Ambrose's table manners and musical manner of eating soup cause Clarence to protest. A quarrel ensues, in which soup and broken dishes fly, and, then the two belligerents escape, in their hurry exchanging overcoats. Clarence rushes home to tell his troubles to Mabel; and Ambrose, meeting his wife on a park bench, unbosoms to her his grievances and is consoled.

Mabel, wondering what Clarence has brought little Peter, explores the coat her husband has left on the rack—and discovers the telephone girl's note to Ambrose. She bursts into the room where Clarence is innocently disporting himself with the baby, and treats him to a terrible trouncing. Then she thrusts him from the house. And five minutes later, babe in arms, she gives pursuit.

Clarence, in a dazed state, wanders into the park, where he comes upon Mrs. Ambrose sitting alone on the bench where Ambrose in his duplicity has charged her to remain until his return—he having gone to keep the appointment with his lady love. Clarence at first does not strike Mrs. Ambrose favorably, but at last he manages to win her sympathy, and when Mabel comes upon them he is unburdening the tale of his marital woes to her. Of course she leaps to the conclusion that this is the "Clarice" who wrote the note, and she savagely attacks the innocent pair. Left alone, Mrs. Ambrose amuses herself with searching the pockets of the overcoat her husband has dropped on the bench—and brings to light, the nursing bottle. Her deductions are not to Ambrose's credit. Mabel meanwhile in order to have both hands free to beat up Clarence, thrusts the baby into the arms of Ambrose who chances to be strolling that way, and he hurries back in consternation to his wife—who instantly faints at the first glimpse of the infant.

Mabel produces Clarice's note and Clarence is more flabbergasted than ever. Then he examines his overcoat and discovers the exchange. Explanations are forthcoming, and Mabel is overjoyed to find that he is not the guilty wretch she thought him. Then, as a subtle revenge, Clarence takes the note to Mrs. Ambrose, saying: "Here is something belonging to your husband." While Mabel and Clarence are happily making up, the real masher in the plot suffers a terrific walloping from the enraged Mrs. Ambrose.

BEAUTY.

THE TIGHTWAD (Nov. 3).—Tobias Frye prefers to bank his money in the fireplace. He scorns all modern improvements, and his wife and daughter drudge from morning till night. An up-to-date young man, Frank Hastings, is in love with Julia Frye. He is a "trouble shooter" for an electric company, and when he tries to persuade Julia's father to grant a right of way through his place, Frye orders him off the premises and forbids him to have anything more to do with his daughter. The enterprising Hastings, however, instals a telephone in a tree, and he and his sweetheart hold frequent conversations. Slick Sam, a tramp, discovers where the miserly old man hides his money. He returns that night with a pal to rob the house, and Julia, who is telephoning in the tree for a doctor for her sick mother, overhears the tramps plotting. She 'phones Hastings for help. Meanwhile the tramps break into the house and Frye is overpowered. But the young electrician and a policeman arrive in time to prevent the robbery and arrest the thieves. When the miser learns about the tree telephone and that this is the means by which his money has been saved, he is converted to new ideas. He sends his worn out wife and daughter to the seaside to recuperate, and on their return they find the house fitted throughout with labor saving appliances. Young Hastings cooks the dinner first by electricity, and Frye warmly welcomes him into the family.

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (No. 43—Nov. 9).—One morning recently Margaret was awakened at a very early hour by the clatter of the telephone bells near the head of her bed. The voice at the other end proved to be Ralph Hamilton's. He had just a few days before come into his uncle's property, which included large silk mills, and he was most anxious that Margaret should attend that afternoon in Paterson, New Jersey, the parade of the silk workers, where she would be the guest of Governor Fielder.

"Our attorney was at the house last night," added Ralph. "My uncle's will fixes it so that I forfeit a large part of the income unless I take immediate charge of the mills and prove in one year that I am competent to handle the business. I've got to make good. And Betty says she'll disown me if I don't."

Margaret was delighted to accept the invitation, but first she had an engagement with Aunt Abbie to do some shopping at Wanamaker's. She promised to hurry the shopping expedition a bit and then motor over to Paterson. So Our Mutual Girl and her aunt visited the famous establishment of the Quaker City merchant, and Margaret selected several pretty evening gowns—every one of American design, for she had determined to help spur American modistes into capturing and retaining the trade of American women in American-made clothes. Then they drove to Paterson.

They were welcomed by Mayor Fordyce and Governor Fielder. From the Governor's box Margaret saw thousands of silk workers pass in review, then she bethought herself of Ralph. It was his first day in his uncle's plant. They decided to drive round to the factory and surprise him. At the mill Aunt Abbie suggested that she stay in the car until Ralph had been found, so Our Mutual Girl entered the office of the big plant alone. She was told by the office boy that Mr. Hamilton was on a tour of inspection and had given strict orders not to be called until he had finished. Margaret made up her mind that in that case she would go to him.

Passing through the superintendent's office she saw a woman in black holding an animated, whispered conversation with the superintendent. She paused to ask directions, then observing that the two had the air of conspirators, and sensing that all was not right, she slipped behind a filing case to listen. What she overheard was a plot to set fire to the mill by overcharging the machinery, and thus ruin young Hamilton's future. It was to be perpetrated at the resumption of work after the lunch hour—and now it was nearly twelve o'clock. As the forewoman turned—for Margaret recognized by their conversation that this was her official capacity—Our Mutual Girl was startled to see the remarkable resemblance between herself and this female conspirator.

Her nimble wits were at work instantly. Presently the superintendent left the room, and the woman, going to the wardrobe, changed her dress. The minute she was gone Margaret scrambled into the black dress she had taken off, and again hid. And noon too soon, for the forewoman came back for her purse and entered the wardrobe. Then our Mutual Girl, darting forward, locked the wardrobe door making her a prisoner. Seeking the superintendent in the huge room full of whirring machinery, she managed to fool him for several minutes. But suddenly, penetrating her disguise, and realizing that she was there to trap him, he seized Margaret and tried to throw her into the whirring wheels. She struggled—then emitted a piercing scream which carried over the jangle of the machinery. Ralph heard it in the front office and came running to see what was wrong. He knew he could not reach the woman in time, so he drew out his revolver and shot at the central switch. The whirring wheels came to a stop. But not until he was by her side and heard her voice did Hamilton recognize Our Mutual Girl. A well directed punch sent the foreman to the floor in unconsciousness—and Margaret was in Ralph Hamilton's arms.

THE WIDOW'S CHILDREN (Nov. 11).—Widow Kelton lives on her tiny ranch with her three children. She works from sun-up till sundown every day except Sunday to eke out an existence for her little family. The Mountain Water Company is building a fence line which brings them through the widow's property. They discover on her land a barn which blocks their line, and unable to convince her that it must be moved, the surveyor sets fire to the building. One of the children, a tot of four years, sees the barn burning, and runs in among the flames and falling timbers "to save the poor horses." She is rescued by the superintendent of the fence gang and restored to her distracted mother. The incident serves to waken the sympathetic interest of the superintendent in Mrs. Kelton and her brood. Eventually the widow and the kindly superintendent marry.

THE FLOATING CALL (Two Parts—Nov. 14).—Bella is the "cub-ess" of the Daily Blade, and the men reporters are jealous of her apparent pull with the managing editor. To discredit her with her boss they send her on a "fake" murder story which never happened, hoping thus to get her off the staff. She goes to the place, finds she has been tricked, but falls across a scoop in which she recognizes twice as big a story as the murder would have been. This puts the laugh on the reporters who then have to accept her.

A big story which has to do with counterfeit money passed by an Italian has just broken. No clue, however, to the source of the supply of false coin can be found. Bella chances to buy a melon at an Italian fruit stand, and on opening it, finds it full of counterfeit money. She sees instantly that this is the channel through which the counterfeiters and their confederates make connections. Dressing up as an Italian girl, she goes to the fruit dealer, and

WHEN VICE SHUDDERED (Nov. 6).—John Gale, president of the National City Bank, is a victim of gambling. His debts accumulate until he is led one night to rob the safe. As he is making his escape he is pursued by the janitor who has returned to the bank for a bottle of medicine for his sick wife which he has forgotten there. Meanwhile two crooks cut the burglar alarm wires and enter the bank. The police see them and give the alarm. Gale and the janitor are struggling at the railway station. The latter is trying to convince the president that he must not flee the town, but should return the money and go home to his wife and children. At last Gale turns back with his adviser to the bank. The crooks, running out of an alley way, with the police in hot pursuit, run into Gale. The bag of money falls, and before the crooks can escape the police have them. Then one of the officers picks up the bag and, handing it to the president, says that the burglars have just emptied the safe. The money is put back. Gale's reputation is saved. And the young janitor goes home with the medicine to his sick wife happy in the realization that he has saved his employer's honor.

A FLIGHT FOR FORTUNE (Two Parts Oct. 25).—James Morrison, a capitalist, has used bribery to secure from the city an important and valuable franchise for a street railway. Charles Brown, a young lawyer in the city's employ, is in love with May, Morrison's stepdaughter, but the latter refuses consent to their marriage because Brown is working against him in his civic capacity. A meeting is held in Morrison's house, and May overhears the discussion. She discovers her step-father's crookedness, and threatens to expose him unless he gives up his plan to loot the city treasury. Morrison takes her to his camp on the bay, locking her up there and placing a guard over her, until the deal shall be safely over. Brown trails Morrison and his colleagues to the camp. They plan to harm him, and May manages to make her escape in order to warn him. She finds a rowboat and tries to reach the opposite shore where she can get help.

Brown learns that his sweetheart is out at sea in a small boat, and unable to secure another craft, calls upon Capt. Hodgson whose hangar is nearby. Meanwhile, Morrison, fearing that May will betray him, pursues her in a motor boat. There ensues an exciting race between the motor boat and the hydro-aeroplane. The latter rescues May on the fly. Her step-father's schemes are ruined, and she and Brown are married.

The next day is Saturday and pay day. Elmer hurries with the money to the agent's office only to learn the has gone to the beach. There Carr, the agent, sees Elmer, forms his own opinion of the spendthrift, and when the young man applies on Monday for an extension, sternly refuses. Elmer and his mother are evicted. Meanwhile the girls enjoy life at the beach, where they are summering, all unconscious of the misfortunes their careless twitting of a sensitive youth have caused.

THE FOLLY OF ANNE (Nov. 13).—Anne leaves her country town to embark upon a career as a writer in the city. She takes a hall bedroom and applies herself to her stories. The landlady is dubious. Anne goes to a publisher and is turned down. She goes to a second publisher and meets with the same fate. It gets to be an old story after a while—and her fund of money is almost gone. One by one she burns her manuscripts to heat soup, until she has but one story left. The landlady demands the rent in advance, and Anne is evicted. Chased from stoop to stoop by the policeman, she at length finds the key of one of the houses under the doormat and takes refuge inside. The young man, who is the owner of the place, presently returns to get some articles he has forgotten. Not finding the key, he enters through the window and Anne takes him for a burglar. She sees him putting things in his suit case. Finding an old revolver, she holds him up, and proposes that he teach her to be a burglar too. He enjoys the joke awhile then he tells Anne who he is. She recognizes the name of a publisher who ninety-nine times has turned down her literary efforts by mail. Handing him the last story remaining, she compels him to sit down then and there and read it. Thus begins a romance which makes Anne's career a double success.

THE LITTLE COUNTRY MOUSE (Nov. 17).—Dorothy, the sweet and unsophisticated daughter of a country clergyman, is invited up to Newport by her worldly cousin for a week end visit. After a day of sight-seeing, she is metamorphosed by borrowed finery into a typical social butterfly. Blundering into a heavy game of bridge, she loses heavily to her hostess, who presses her for payment. A middle-aged roue induces her to accept his check for the amount, which she endorses and turns over to her hostess. To her consternation the roue then shows his hand and insists on a pro quid quo for his money. As Dorothy cannot appeal to her father for money for a gambling debt, she is in a dilemma. She tells her story to Lt. Hawkhurst. He bribes a social tame-cat to part with some of the hostess' love letters and, using them as a bludgeon, finally induces that lady to hand over check. He then tears it up under the roue's nose and throws him out of the place. An engagement between the lieutenant and Dorothy now closes the affair.

At a certain signal, they are to rush in and take him into custody. Meanwhile a crook, pursued by two cops, takes refuge in Mr. Henpeck's kitchen. Mrs. Henpeck gets wise to hubby's game, locks him in the kitchen, and gives the signal herself. The crook forces Henpeck to exchange clothes with him, so that when the friends arrive they find themselves looking into the muzzle of a thirty-eight gun. When the real policemen reach the house they find henpeck dressed in the crook's clothes and decide that he is their man. They rush him off to the cooler, and after much business of mistaken identity, he finally is released, promising never again to try to put one over on his clever spouse.

ROYAL.

A FORTUNE IN PANTS (Nov. 14).—A young messenger, entrusted with the delivery of a famous precious stone, accidentally is left at a small way-station. While the messenger is taking a bath at the hotel, a crook enters the bath room and steals his trousers. The crook rifles the pockets of all the money in them but misses the precious stone. Then he throws the trousers into an ashcan where a tramp finds them and sells them to a dealer in old clothing. Meanwhile, the messenger, clad only in the shower shield, rushes from the bath room, dons a strange suit of clothes which he finds in an unlocked room, and hurries to the street. He meets the tramp, who tells him of the discovery and sale of the trousers, and they run to the old clothes shop—only to find that the trousers have been sold to an actor. The messenger is in despair. Then, under the swinging doors of a bar room, he spies the familiar pant legs. He dives in, captures the actor, the trousers and the precious stone. Tramp, old clothes dealer and actor all collapse when they see what they have missed.

THANHOUSER.

THE CHASM (Nov. 6).—Dr. Mureaux, a widower, has an only daughter, Ruth. One night when her father is away, a burglar breaks into the house. Ruth displays great courage, winning the admiration of the intruder. She questions him about his mode of living and finally induces the man to promise that he will return in a few days when she will do all in her power to get him an honest job. When her father comes home Ruth tells him about her adventure and that the man has given her his word that he will return. But the doctor is a strict believer in punishment for the evil-doer. Saying nothing to his daughter, he makes arrangements for the capture of the burglar. The man is seized and put in prison. The fact that he has been betrayed by her own father causes estrangement between Ruth and the doctor. As time passes, Dr. Mureaux becomes remorseful. He secures a pardon for the burglar, and after helping the man to find honest employment the breach between father and daughter is healed.

THE TERROR OF ANGER (Two Parts—Nov. 10).—Gilbert Rawlings, a wealthy business man, does not realize that his wife has ceased to care for him. He is overcome when he finds her gone, leaving a note saying that she never will return. He pursues the elopers, but the chase is brief, for their automobile goes over the edge of a bluff and the wife and her lover are killed. Returning home, and seeing his baby boy sleeping, Rawlings is filled with a terrible hatred toward all womankind. That night he has a dream. It seems to him that he has taken his boy into the wilderness where he is bringing him up to be a savage and to hate women. A young girl, traveling with some tourists, strays into the forest, and Rawlings makes a drudge of her. His son, now almost, a young man, in spite of his bringing up, resents his father's cruelty to the girl. At last he helps her to escape. The father pursues the runaways, and in a hand-to-hand fight with his son is about to kill him—when he wakes from his dream. It comes over him then, that, false as his own wife may have been, he has no right to prejudice his son against women, but should permit him to believe the truth—that most women are loyal —and help him to win a wife who will make him happy.

THE CHARITY BALL (K. & E.—Biograph—Three Parts).—Rev. John VanBuren is worried about the health of his brother Dick, a stock broker. John persuades his mother, who is blind, and his sister Bess to urge Dick to go away for a rest. Phyllis Lee (whom Dick has betrayed under promise of marriage) takes her invalid father to Florida. Dick receives a letter from Phyllis informing him of her father's grave condition and beseeching him to keep his promise. Dick, under pressure of business, finally collapses and is ordered abroad. John VanBuren is assisted in his philanthropic work by Ann Cruger. Ann is the daughter of Franklin Cruger, Dick's most powerful rival. Ann has noticed that John is tired out and needs a change.

John goes to Florida for a couple of weeks. While there he meets Phyllis and her invalid father. Phyllis is startled at the mention of John's last name, but being sworn to silence she does not disclose the fact of her association with Dick. Phyllis's father grows gradually worse and the doctor warns her that the end is near. Phyllis sends for John, who comes and speaks words of spiritual consolation to her father. Mr. Lee, realizing that he is going to die, entreats John to look after his daughter. John promises. He takes Phyllis to his home, where she receives a warm welcome. In the short time John has known Phyllis he has fallen in love with her, but owing to her sad loss does not speak of it. Cruger's activities force Dick to return home. When Phyllis is alone with Dick she pleads with him to marry her. He refuses, having already made up his mind the only way to dethrone Cruger is to marry his daughter Ann. John confides in Ann that he is in love with Phyllis. Ann is heartbroken as she is in love with John.

Dick and Cruger are worried over the action of the market. Dick meets his opponent at the Charity Ball and tells him that he regrets that he has to fight against the father of the woman he loves. Cruger admires his grit, gives his consent and wishes him luck. Alec, Cruger's clerk, is in love with Bess VanBuren. He asks her to be his wife and she blushingly consents. Phyllis breaks down and tells Ann all, but does not mention Dick's name. Ann takes her to her home and tries to console her. Phyllis decides to confess all to John and while Ann is preparing her own room she hurries to the VanBuren home. Phyllis tells her story to John. Ann discovers Phyllis's absence and surmising where she has gone, hurries to the rectory to prevent Phyllis from telling John. Ann reaches the house before Phyls has told her story. Ann tries to persuade Phyllis to wait until the next day, but Phyllis refuses. John listens in horror and demands to know the name of the man. Phyllis, however, cannot be urged to reveal his name. Dick returns from the ball and from Phyllis's actions at the sound of his voice, Ann and John are assured that Dick is the guilty man. Dick tells John that Cruger has given his consent to his marrying his daughter Ann. John demands that he marry Phyllis. Dick refuses and they have a violent quarrel. Bess tells her brothers of her engagement to Alec. After Bess leaves, John asks Dick how he would feel if some scoundrel had dealt with their sister as he is dealing with Phyllis. Dick then realizes the full horror of the situation. He begs Phyllis's forgiveness and at his request they are married at once by John.

Dick again plunges into business and during one of the exciting periods on the "Street" he succumbs to heart disease, thus paying a high price for his ambition. John meanwhile sees his mistake in thinking he loved Phyllis and realizes that he has always loved Ann. While writing Ann that it has "dawned upon him that that which he regarded as friendship for her is love," she enters and he shows her the letter. An understanding reached at last, they are happily married.

THE WAGES OF SIN (K. & E.—Biograph—Three Parts).—Mrs. Hope, an employee in the Medford Mills, dies. Mr. Dean, the owner, adopts her daughter Ruth. Stephen Marley, cousin of the Rev. George Brand, who is in love with Ruth, is an unwelcome visitor at the parsonage. Brand secures a position for Stephen in the mills. Stephen makes the acquaintance of Rose Dean and her foster sister, Ruth, and shows his admiration for Ruth. Stephen strikes up an acquaintance with Barbara Dale, a mill hand.

Rev. George Brand proposes to Ruth but she puts him off, telling him he must get Mr. Dean's permission. Dean gives his consent. Stephen overhears the conversation and determines to win Ruth. Stephen entices Barbara away from home and then deserts her. Barbara's father turns her out of the house. She implores Stephen to marry her but he refuses. Ruth meets Barbara and tries to comfort her. Lieutenant Wentworth, Rose's fiance, leaves to join his regiment. Barbara again implores Stephen to save her from disgrace. He tells her if she will agree to accuse George Brand and tell Ruth it was Brand who wronged her, he will marry her. Barbara is horrified but finally agrees. Barbara calls at the Dean home and tells Ruth that George Brand wronged her. Ruth is overcome at Barbara's alleged confession and when Brand calls, he is astonished at her change of heart. Stephen pays attention to Ruth and when he proposes, Ruth, anxious to get away from George and her friends, accepts him. Stephen urges Ruth to marry him at once and late that night Ruth leaves a note for Rose telling her she has gone forever and departs with Stephen. Rose and her father are overcome with grief.

Two years later, Ruth and her baby, in poverty, are neglected by Stephen. Juliana, an actress, befriends Ruth. George Brand, now a revivalist in the city, recognizes Ruth. He follows her to her home and offers to help her. Ruth realizing her child is dangerously ill, accept his aid. Stephen enters and demands money. He struggles with Ruth, finally overpowering her, and flees with the money. Frantic with grief, Ruth rushes out and entering a saloon, grabs a bill from the hand of Harry Wentworth, who is in the city. Ruth retraces her steps, followed by a policeman and Wentworth. She pleads with Wentworth but he turns a deaf ear to her pleadings and she is led away as her child dies. Ruth is found guilty and sentenced to prison.

A few months later Ruth is released. Believing she is dying, Ruth sends for her foster-father and Rose, who take her home. Ruth is about to retire when she is disturbed by a noise and is horrified to find Stephen and Ned, his

She confronts Stephen and tells him if he does not tell the truth, regarding George, she will denounce him. Enraged, he beats her unmercifully. STONEWALL JACKSON'S WAY (Lubin—Three Parts).—With the winter, "Stonewall" Jackson comes back to Virginia, his purpose being to hold inoperative the Federal army encamped in the Valley, until Lee can make certain movements. Jackson goes into camp a few miles from the Federal forces. With Jackson are Colonel Bradley and Captains Robert Randolph and Roderick Hilton, father and suitors to Louise Bradley.

Louise clearly shows that Robert has her heart, and Roderick is filled with jealousy. His sense of honor stifled, Roderick resorts to a miserable trick which causes Louise, almost broken-hearted, to turn from Robert in disgust. For some time the Valley has been almost at the mercy of a savage guerilla band, headed by one Quetrell. This ruffian, attempted to steal Louise's pet horse, encounters the girl, who is saved from his brutal advances by her father, who is at home on leave. For the thrashing which Colonel Bradley causes to be administered, Quetrell swears vengeance, not satisfied with having seriously wounded the Colonel.

That night the Bradley home is attacked by the guerillas. Colonel Bradley is mortally wounded, the house is left in flames, and Louise carried off to the guerilla camp. Bill, a faithful negro, saves his master and mistress from the flames, and then traces the guerillas to their hiding place. Next he hurries to the Confederate camp with the news of the outrage and of Louise's peril. Both Robert and Roderick beg to be allowed to go to her rescue, but Jackson, facing an enemy of overwhelming numbers who may attack at any moment, and knowing how disastrous to the Southern cause would be his defeat at this time, will not permit any detachment to be withdrawn.

Robert though tortured by his inactivity, sees no course open to him. Roderick, however, resolves on a daring expedient, and steals away from the camp, dressed in the uniform of a Union colonel, and carrying a forged order to the Union commander, which procures for him the command of a troop of Union cavalry. With this force Roderick attacks the guerrilla camp, wipes out the band, and rescues Louise, whom he causes to be returned to the cabin in which her mother has found shelter.

Roderick succeeds in separating himself from the Union troops without being recognized by Louise, but in attempting to re-enter the Confederate camp he is captured. He is placed under arrest and soon tried by court-martial for disobedience of orders and being absent from his command, in the face of the enemy. He is found guilty, and the sentence is formal reduction to the ranks. The Federal army breaks camp, makes a short march, and bivouacs about the cabin where Louise and her mother have found shelter. Louise learns that the plan is to attack Jackson at dawn the next day, and carries the news to the Confederate camp. Jackson at once abandons his camp and marches away into the mountains from whence he came, and scouts bring to the Union commander the news that Jackson has not dared accept battle, but is in full flight, that none of the enemy remain in the Valley of Virginia.

The Union army lies down to sleep with a feeling of perfect security. Meanwhile the terrible forced march of Jackson's army through the mountains continues—the men are half starved and frozen, the horses are exhausted, the men struggle desperately to drag their artillery through the mud and snow, up the mountain roads. Many fall by the wayside, but the column staggers on without pause. Roderick falls exhausted, and is found by Robert, who, himself almost at last gasp, is struggling on after the army. Robert's first impulse is to leave his rival to die in the snow, but he conquers this and assists him to his feet.

An hour before dawn, there is a sudden wild alarm in the Union camp—from out of the blackness come wild yells and the flash of rifles and cannon—the only light is from the flaming guns. Jackson, marching in a complete circle, has crossed and recrossed the mountains, coming back unseen into the valley, and delivered a furious attack.

The Federal rally desperately, but the surprise and assault from the rear has been perfect—the battle in the dark rages for awhile, then the firing dies away. In the height of the battle, a shell has entered the cabin in the center of the field, and the faithful negro Bill has given his life to protect Louise and her mother. Dawn closes with the Confederates in possession of the bloody field. Robert and Roderick, both wounded, are lying side by side, and both are taken into the cabin, which has been turned into a small hospital. Louise, doing what she can for the wounded, comes upon her two lovers, and Roderick sees that it is still Robert who has her heart. Dying, Roderick confesses his miserable trick, and in her happiness, Louise forgives him.

THE TELL-TALE HAND (Essanay—Three Parts).—Tim Cantlie, an evil-looking fellow, is drinking at a bar. The saloonkeeper's daughter enters, and Tim, slightly tipsy, tries to kiss her. She struggles to escape him. Broncho Billy enters and draws his gun. Tim flees. Tim gets his horse and rides away. As he approaches a house on a hill nearby, he sees Annie Fango run out of her home, her father cursing her. Tim seizes and kisses her. She strikes him in the face and screams. Her father then comes out and drives Tim away. He sends Annie back into the house, following her with his gun. Tim swears vengeance.

He sneaks about the house and finally Annie rushes out again and flees in terror to the woods. Tim sneaks into the house and stabs Fango. Then he takes a piece of the skirt that Fango has torn from his daughter's dress in his struggle to horsewhip her. He rushes to the sheriff and tells him that Annie has killed her father and a posse starts in pursuit. In the meantime Broncho Billy has left the barroom and rides towards home. He meets Annie and she tries to evade him. He finally corners her and asks her what is the trouble. She sees that he is not going to harm her and asks him to protect her. He takes her on his horse and, seeing a posse coming, takes a by-path and eludes it. They camp for the night and Broncho stays awake while Annie sleeps.

Broncho is overcome by weariness, however, and falls asleep. The posse discovers them and arrests Annie. She is taken to jail, put on trial and convicted. Broncho is much troubled over Tim's eagerness to have the girl convicted and follows him. He sees him go to the Fango home. He grows more suspicious. Broncho examines Fango's shirt and sees the imprint of a hand. He takes a piece of paper and pours chemical on it. Then he meets Tim in a barroom and manages to force his hand down upon it. Tim runs for his horse and flees. Broncho pursues. They have a terrible running battle on horseback. Neither have guns and they fight hand to hand.

Tim is finally overpowered, bound and brought back to the sheriff's office. There it is found that the hand print on the paper corresponds with that on the shirt. Tim breaks down and confesses. Broncho then releases Annie.

THE STORY OF THE BLOOD RED ROSE (Selig—Three Parts).—The story is laid in the middle of the Seventeenth Century, and the incidents take place in the fanciful kingdom of Urania in the days when soldiers use cross-bows instead of guns and when laced sleeves and witches were the fashion. In a dark and gloomy grotto, the home of Hagar, the witch, burns a fire and from a rude tripod of sticks over the fire, hangs a steaming kettle.

Paulo, the young huntsman, and Godiva, his sweetheart, meet in the forest. Paulo exhibits with great pride a deer which he has just killed. Godiva explains to Paulo that they must not forget their old friend, Hagar, the witch. Therefore, they make their way together to the gloomy cavern and after playfully surprising the old crone, they present her with a haunch of venison. They are much interested in the magic brew which simmers in the great pot. The witch notes their interest and explains that she is brewing a magic potion which will change a human being into an animal or other object at the desire of the partaker.

While the young lovers are visiting their old friend, the witch, the king of Urania is returning from the hunt, accompanied by his retinue of gentlemen of the court. The King is thirsty, and observing in the distance the cot of a shepherd, directs his way to the humble abode for the purpose of obtaining a glass of milk. While he is drinking it, the young lovers approach the shepherd's cot, the home of Godiva. The King is startled by the beauty of the young peasant girl and shows her attentions. Paulo becomes frantic with indignation. He follows the couple and when he discovers the King seizing his sweetheart and pressing his hot passionate kisses upon her face and lips, Paulo seizes the monarch by the throat and throws him to the ground.

The retainers of the royal ravisher crowd to his assistance, seize Paulo, bind him, and take him to the royal castle, where he is cast into a cold, gloomy oubliettte infested by rats and lighted but dimly through a tiny window. The old witch gives Godiva the magic potion and whispers to her that in time of stress and danger, she may swallow the contents and change herself into a beautiful white rose, which will never die.

The King tells the story of his meeting with Godiva to his chamberlain. Together they plot, and decide finally to abduct the girl. A small body of the King's retainers is dispatched to the shepherd's cot with instructions to return with the beautiful girl. It is the King's orders. Sancha, a spy, in the employ of the queen, and her lover, overhears the conversation between the King and his chamberlain, and hastening to the Queen, tells her of the King's passion for the beautiful young shepherdess. Throwing off her cloak of royal austerity, the Queen bursts into a passionate rage, fired by jealousy, and at once plots with Sancha to dispose of her rival. But first she must have sight of this marvelously beautiful girl; so she disguises herself, and together with Sancha locates Godiva in the cavern home of the old witch. Such beauty is dangerous, the Queen decides, and orders Sancha to assassinate her.

The Queen's bravos and the King's abductors meet at the shepherd's cottage. There is a fight and the King's men carry Godiva away. The King places her in the secret chamber, and endeavors to woo her, but she repulses him. Angered by her resistance, the King leads her to the dungeon and pointing exultantly through the grating, shows her the figure of Paulo, her lover, lying on the cold stones in the oubliette. There is a noise in the apartments above: Godiva realizes her peril. She calls softly to her lover, and while the attention of the King is distracted by the sounds of approaching footsteps, she tells Paulo of the magic powder and its powers. A beautiful white rose falls between the iron bars of the grating, into the hands of the distracted young lover, who passionately kisses it. His sweetheart has come to him.

Angered, the Queen enters, but the King, amazed at Godiva's disappearance, pleads ignorance of her whereabouts. In the excitement that follows, Paulo succeeds in escaping from the dungeon and becomes a wild man of the forest, his only companion being the beautiful, fragrant, white rose, which reposes always in his bosom. After a year of wandering, Paulo meets the King in the forest and kills him, but the King's bowmen avenge his death by sending an arrow into the breast of Paulo. The arrow pierces the rose in his bosom and his life's blood stains the blossom to a brilliant scarlet. His soul departs to meet her spirit which has been released from the flower.

A SOLDIER'S DUTY (Three Parts).—Count Eric Konovitz, the military attache of Strassland, is sent to Grovania. He has been ordered to attend a court ball and meet the Chamberlain, Von Thiel, whose residence, being close to the Myrano fortress, would be of material advantage to him as a basis of operation. Good fortune favors the count. He is the means of some slight assistance to Therese, the charming daughter of Von Thiel, and makes such an impression on her that he receives an invitation to visit the Chamberlain's home. Shortly afterward a hunting party is formed which, taking the count near the fortress, gives him the chance of making observations for future use.

The young foreign attache's continued presence at the Chamberlain's home arouses suspicion. Lieutenant Hanser, a cousin of Therese, receives a letter from the war office of Grovania requesting him to watch the count's movements. In the meantime, under the influence of Therese's charms, the count suffers his mission to occupy a secondary position in his mind. After receiving various notes in cipher from Strassland urging him to forward the desired information, the count bestirs himself and secretly visits the neighborhood of the fortress and proceeds to draw certain plans. A little Laplander, whose hatred the count has aroused by uncalled for harshness, follows him and finding a pocketbook which the spy has left, keeps it for future use.

War clouds gather over Grovania and the count is ordered to gain at once the information necessary and forward it to his government. To further his projects, he leaves the Chamberlain's house and, disguised as a mechanic of the peasant class, takes lodgings in the cottage of Gunhild, a peasant friend of Therese. He soon arouses in her a deep and enduring love, and innocently she is the means of giving him the information he desires. She tells him that a certain flume leads to the military bridge that he has been unable to approach because of a heavy guard. That same night he stealthily leaves his room after writing a letter to Therese in which he tells her that he is about to fulfil the mission entrusted to him and that not even his love for her can sway him from fulfilling his duty to his country. Going to the flume, he suffers the swft current to carry him down to the bridge. Stealing upon one of the sentries, he hurls him from the structure below and then blows up the bridge. While he is doing this the Laplander hurries to the Chamberlain's house, tells him of his discovery and brands him as a spy. A little later, Lieutenant Hansen, Therese and Gunhild find in the waters of the river the lifeless body of the man who had subordinated his own love to that of his country.

THE OLD FOGEY (Pathe—Three Parts).—Ezra, a trusted bookkeeper, receives an invitation to the circus from his employer. The invitation recalls to his mind the days of his youth when he first went to the circus, taking with him the girl he loved. It was a fateful pleasure trip for him. De Mauvais, the head ring-master, a handsome but unscrupulous man, at once became an object of great attraction to Alva, Ezra's sweetheart. After the performance the girl expressed a desire to meet the man and congratulate him upon his skill. The next day, Ezra received a note from Alva telling him that she was going away with the man she loved. With these recollections in his mind, Ezra sets out for the circus, taking with him the little daughter of his employer. To his great surprise, he recognizes in the woman liontamer his sweetheart of the by-gone years, and feeling the call of the old love, makes himself known to her.

De Mauvais has failed to marry the girl, and daily contact with his coarse nature has brought her to his level. In spite of his ill-treatment, Alva still loves the man and finds great unhappiness in the fact that she has occasion to suspect his fidelity to her. The day after her meeting with Ezra, De Mauvais tells Alva that he has a business engagement and leaves the circus to keep an appointment at a restaurant with another woman. Ezra, to renew old times, invites Alva to dine with him at the same restaurant. She accompanies him. Seeing De Mauvais there, she at once perceives the nature of his "business engagement." The next morning she reproaches him. He tells her that he must have ten thousand dollars at once and that if she secures it for him he will throw over the other woman. Meanwhile Ezra's mind is filled with dreams of a little home with Alva as his wife.

Alva decides at once to use her old sweetheart as a means to regain her lover's affection. She writes a letter to herself, ostensibly from her attorney, stating that the mortgage on her late uncle's estate will be foreclosed at once unless ten thousand dollars is paid, also that the attorney has a client who will pay twice as much for the property two or three days later. Armed with this letter, she goes to Ezra's boarding house and proceeds to delude him into the belief that the little home and marriage to him are likewise much in her thoughts. When she judges that the time is ripe, she shows him the fake letter and asks his financial aid. He tells her that his savings only amount to two thousand dollars, but she insists that it is only for a day that she needs the money, and Ezra is persuaded to make up the balance from a large sum belonging to his employer which he took home with him that day, as it was too late to bank it. The girl no sooner departs with the money than Ezra finds, from a note which she accidentally dropped, the depth of her perfidy. Half crazed by what he has done he leaves at once for the circus grounds. Meanwhile, De Mauvais receives a visit from his latest love in his office. Excited by her visit, he neglects to close the door of the lion's cage and one of them escapes and makes for the mountains. Into the car comes also Alva, and the other woman barely has time to hide. Alva gives the money to De Mauvais and in a few moments the guilty pair are confronted by the excited Ezra. He demands the money and Alva denies that she has received any from him.

Realizing the weakness of his case through lack of witnesses, Ezra leaves broken-hearted. The other woman hears him departing and thinking that Alva is leaving, comes out of her hiding place. Enraged by this evidence of her lover's perfidy, Alva seeks to take a loaded revolver from De Mauvais' desk. De Mauvais tries to take it from her. The revolver is discharged and the other woman is stretched dying upon the floor. Realizing that he will be accused of the crime, De Mauvais makes his escape to the mountains, followed by the police. As he climbs higher and higher among the rocks to escape his pursuers, fate leads him to the spot where the escaped lion has taken refuge. The lion becomes an instrument of the law's vengeance and leaping upon De Mauvais he hurls him to the ground, dead. A few moments later the police arrive and take his body back to the circus. There they find in his pocket the money which Alva gave him and they restore it to her. Overcome with remorse and feeling pity for the man whom she nearly ruined, she goes to Ezra and restores his money in time to save him from disgrace.

THE PERFECT "THIRTY-SIX" ('Four Parts).—Gertie, a charming, lively young girl living in a little village, graduates from the high school, and her mother at once sends her to her Aunt Amelia, proprietress of a fashionable garment store in Leipsig, to be broken into the business. Arriving at Leipsig, she is at once put to work by her Aunt, who is a very capable business woman. Great as is the contrast between her present life in Leipsig as compared with that of her native village, she sighs for life in Berlin where, as her favorite line of fiction tells her, beautiful young girls can have the world at their feet. Not long after her debut in the garment store, enters Sigmund Phillippsohn, salesman for a wholesale garment house in Berlin. He is the friend of every one in the shop and there ensues a flutter of excitement from Amelia down to the errand girls. He sees Gertie and she scores a hit upon his nice discernment. He invites her Aunt and her to dine with him that evening, and then wires his house that he has found a perfect thirty-six and asking if he will hire her. His house answers telling him to "send her along." He broaches the subject to Gertie and finds her more than willing to accept. The next day she airily trips from the shop, giving her poor Aunt an unexpected and unwelcome farewell.

Arriving at Mayer and Nathanson's cloak and suit emporium in Berlin, the green girl does not make an immediate hit with Mayer, but she is taken on. Moritz Abramowsky, however, sees the diamond in the rough and determines to get in her good graces. He invites her to supper with him and she gladly accepts. A sad awakening the frugal Moritz takes her to a beanery of the type where the waiters yell "draw one in the dark" and "ham and." While Moritz is foraging among the eatables of a neighboring table, the house salesman of Mayer and Nathanson enters in search of Gertie and carries her off to a real restaurant.

Gertie's rise in the business is rapid. The princess of the royal family calls at the emporium to select a costume. The various models parade before her in all their refinery, but of them all it is Gertie who makes the hit. Through her skillful showing, the princess purchases liberally and leaves, stating that she desires Miss Gertie to always wait upon her in the future. The fame of her ability travels, and she is offered a position at double her present salary by a rival concern. Gertie decides to accept it, and so does not go down to business that day. It so happens that the princess requests Mayer to call at the palace that very day and bring Miss Gertie with him to show the new gowns. Alarmed by the model's absence, he accepts Moritz's advice and calls upon the absent girl in person. He persuades her to go with him to the palace. At the conclusion of a most successful call he determines to make the girl his for all time, proposes and is accepted.

THE PERILS OF PAULINE (17th Episode—Two Parts).—Completely restored after her last harrowing experience, Pauline Marvine idles the moments away in harmless pastimes. Much of her time is given to a small bull terrier which was given to her by her friend, Lucille. Her very evident affection for the small brute is looked upon with disfavor by her lover, Harry, who jealously begrudges each caress bestowed by her. The presence of the dog gives Owen, the scheming secretary, an idea which he speedily starts to put into execution. Meeting his fellow conspirator, Balthazar, he arranges with him to steal the dog and entice Pauline away from the Marvin home by getting her to call for the dog later. Thus he would capture his ward and remove her from his path. Then to gain control of the Marvin estate.

Balthazar manages to steal the dog, which he takes to a supposedly vacant house in the suburbs. In reality, this house is occupied by a notorious gang of counterfeiters who are on friendly terms with Balthazar. He explains his mission and is promised co-operation by them. A sinister looking old hag, a member of the gang, is later induced by Owen, who is presented to the counterfeiters by his henchman, to write to Pauline advising her that she is in possession of the "lost" dog which was advertised for in the papers. Pauline immediately sets out in her racing car to claim her pet, but is plainly perturbed to note that the address given is that of an old deserted house. Overcoming her fears, however, she rings the bell, which is answered by the old hag. Bidding Pauline to follow, she leads the way into the house. She approaches a wall and knocks with a secret signal. A panel opens and the two women pass through. Stepping into a room, Pauline sees her dog and eagerly starts toward it. She is seized by the counterfeiters. During the struggle that follows, the dog makes a dash from the room and escapes. Some time later Harry is surprised to see the dog running toward him trailing a broken piece of rope. Picking up the rope, Harry is lead away by the dog in the direction from whence he came. Suspecting foul play, Harry allows the dog to lead him and finally reaches the old house in front of which he sees Pauline's racer. Making his way into the basement, the dog scratches on the panel which leads to the room where Pauline is held captive. Harry hears the approach of the counterfeiters' distributing agents and hides. He sees them give the secret signal and pass in. Waiting a moment, he also gives the signal and passes through the panel which he fastens with a chunk of wood. As soon as Harry is seen, the gang makes a rush for him. Shouting to Pauline to rush out, Harry quickly evades the gang and followed by the dog they dash out to the racing machine in which they make their escape. The gang gives chase in the agents' touring car. Owing to a punctured tire, Harry and Pauline desert their machine and take refuge in a contractor's shack nearby.

The gang attempts to follow, but Harry stands them off with a rifle which he finds in the shack. Balthazar discovers some powder bombs left by the contractor and determines to blow up the shack. He sneaks toward the shack and lights the fuse. Attracted by the sputtering, the dog grasps it and dashes away, trailing the bomb after him. Coming to a bridge, the dog leaps down into the water, extinguishing the fuse. He then swims to shore where he is found by a party of campers. They discover the bomb and wonder at its being in the dog's possession. Following his lead, they arrive at the shack just in time to save Harry and Pauline from the attack of the counterfeiters, who had already succeeded in smashing down the door. A furious struggle follows, but the youthful campers soon have the counterfeiters hors de combat. Balthazar, however, has managed to escape and carries the news of his latest failure to Owen, his villainous employer.

of their country. Downcast, the lovers retreat to another room, and during their conversation are aroused by a newsboy crying out the latest extra. Dashing to the street, Ivan purchases a paper and reads that the opposing powers, having failed to come to an amiable agreement, have made a final declaration of war. Reading this, he persuades Helen to elope with him.

This she consents to do, and after hasty preparations they escape that night, and entering a waiting automobile they start on their wild dash through the enemies' lines. Amid hair breath encounters with sentinels who, trying in vain to obstruct their passage, they finally cross the border into Ivan's camp. He immediately persuades the mayor of the village to marry them, and in the midst of the wedding the pursuing cavalry charge upon the village. The mayor tells Ivan of a secret passage which will lead them outside of the city. He implores him to take this in order that they may escape, and after many thrilling adventures they finally reach its end and lay down in a field for rest. A scouting party of the enemies come upon them and immediately arrests Helen as a spy, while Ivan, bound hand and foot, is left to die. Helen is taken to a temporary prison to await instructions. Maurice, who had joined the rival army as an aviator, discovers that Helen is being held prisoner and he decides to rescue her. After eluding the soldiers, Maurice places her in an aeroplane and starts on their journey to safety.

In the meantime, Ivan, having released himself of his bands, and finding his way back to his own camp, starts out in an endeavor to save Helen. He discovers an aeroplane of the enemies flying overhead. Not knowing that it contains his wife and best friend—Maurice, he orders his men to fire upon it, destroying it. When they arrive at the side of the wrecked aeroplane Ivan discovers his great mistake, finding Helen dead, a victim of war.

THE HEREAFTER (Four Parts).—An angel appears to the great poet, whereupon he asks to be guided to his poetic elusions. He ascends to Heaven on the sphere of fire, enters the moon and there meets Piccarda De Donate, who on earth was a nun, and known for her enchanting beauty. Through the sphere of mercury he speaks to Giustinanio, the great ruler. Cunizza Da Ramano, sister of the tyrant Exelino, gives a pictorial vision of her wisdom and sacrifices during the Holy War. He now descends to Purgatory. Purgatory, in comparative religions, is any state or place succeeding the present life and serving as a means of moral purification. In Roman theology it is a place in which souls who depart this life in the Grace of God suffer for a time because they still need to be cleansed from venial or have still to pay the temporal punishment due to mortal sin. The existence of a Purgatory was defined by the Councils of Florence 1438. It was declared that the souls in Purgatory are assisted by the sufferage of the faithful and especially by sacrifice of the altar. Beyond this nothing is defined, the same degree enjoins bishops to abstain from difficult and subtile questions in their discussions on the subject, and prohibit curious inquiries, superstitious practices and making of Purgatory a source of gain as scandals and stumbling blocks to the faithful. Arriving at the door of Purgatory, he encounters a huge monster with seven heads, driving the Luxurious to horror and torture.

An angel carrying souls in a boat appears, and amongst them is Cassella an exquisite singer, who recognizes the poet. He sees the gluttons suffer hunger and thirst; the misers in brimestone, the slothful in a continuous run of agony. Entering the place where the passionate suffer, the poet has a vision of the martyrdom of St. Stephen. The envious have their eyes sewn together with a thread of iron. The proud are seen carrying enormous rocks in which stories of humility are engraved. We next have a vision of Pia Dei Tolomei, who died a violent death. In the midst of Luxury lovers Guido Guinicelli and Arnaldo Daniell present themselves to the poets. An angel warns the poets that to go elsewhere they must cross the flames and by the help of the angel they succeed in crossing. Virgil removes the soot of infernal regions from the poet's face, and crowns him. From Purgatory he again ascends tells him of how he fought for Christ in the two holy wars to Paradise. He meets Cacciaguida, his great grandfather, who in Cherubin, he sees God reflected in splendor and surrounded by angels. The poet then sees the glorious Mother of God in the imperial sky.

KINETOPHOTE CORP.

MARKIA; or THE DESTRUCTION OF CARTHAGE (Five Parts).—In ancient times Rome looked upon Carthage as her greatest rival, and determined to plan her downfall. Cato, a Roman Senator, appealed to the Senate to conquer Carthage, and under a pretext that she had failed to keep faith, the Romans began a new war. The Roman army embarked for Africa and landed near Carthage. (This ends the prologue.)

Markia, daughter of General Astrubal, Governor of Carthage, asks permission of Zamah, her stepmother, to visit the Temple outside the town, which is refused, but Astrubal intercedes and consents to Markia's doing so. Mobi, Astrubal's spy, brings news to him of the triumphant advance of the Romans on African soil, and from the walls of the city they watch the retreat of the Carthaginian army commanded by General Annon. Astrubal, ambitious to become the dictator, conspires to cause the downfall of Annon, and induces the city council to bar the mercenary troops from the town, fearing disorder and plundering. Messengers are dispatched to the warriors with this command, and they rebel, but Annon calms them by promising to present their grievances. In the meantime, Astrubal denounces Annon, and upon the latter's appearance in the Senate he is assassinated.

Upon returning from the Temple, Markia is abducted by some of Annon's warriors, but Sirabas, his lieutenant, releases her and escorts her to the city. The impatient warriors start an uproar outside the city, but Astrubal calms them, consenting to receive a deputation with their grievances. Sirabas heads the delegation and is received by Astrubal, who apparently yields to the soldiers' request. Upon beholding Sirabas, Markia's stepmother, falls in love with him. Astrubal entertains his warriors in the banquet hall, but plans a massacre that night by his bodyguard, who secretly enter the palace.

Zamah, Astrubal's wife, tries to save Sirabas by summoning him to her chamber. While there he hears the clamor of the fight and realizes the treachery of Astrubal. Sirabas escapes from the town and carries the news of the massacre to the waiting warriors. Markia, who had seen Sirabas leave the chamber of Zamah, has lost faith in him and seeks seclusion in the Temple. Sirabas and his soldiers join the Romans, who, headed by young Scipio, receive him with open arms. Preparations are made for the siege of the city.

Astrubal's bodyguard sallies forth and captures Sirabas and a Roman outpost. Markia begs her father to save Sirabas and her plea is successful. She repulses him, however, and he determines to seek an explanation. Later he meets her in the sacred garden and convinces her of the truth. While trying to escape from the garden Sirabas is taken prisoner and Zamah has him sentenced to galley-slavery, and he is chained in the hold of a ship.

The town is attacked by the Roman legions and conquered. Astrubal deserts his followers and flees to his galleys with his daughter. Zamah, however, refuses to desert the palace and dies a heroic death. The Roman fleet pursues Astrubal's galleys and defeats them, Astrubal being killed in the melee. Markia discovers Sirabas chained in the ship's hold, and succeeds in breaking the chain. Sirabas in turn rescues Markia from the raging flames and, throwing her overboard, jumps after her, leaving the galley to burn to the water's edge. Both lovers succeed in reaching the shore and are reunited once more.

THE SPAN OF LIFE (Four Parts).—Dunstan Leech, an unscrupulous gambler, victim of drugs, plans to marry his mother's ward, Kate Heathcote, that he may hide the embezzlement of funds entrusted to his care. His mother summons him from London to their country home, where he discovers Kate to be in love with Richard Blunt, who is tutoring his crippled half-brother Cecil. Unable to make Kate listen to his love, Leech plans to kill Cecil to gain possession of the money which will revert to him upon Cecil's death. He injects morphine into a prize bunch of grapes which is being saved for Cecil's birthday. The boy eats the grapes, dying from the effects. Leech's mother, Mrs. Jelf, determines to ruin Blunt in Kate's eyes by making it appear that a robbery has been committed and having the money discovered upon his person.

The plot fails and Blunt, whose suspicion had been aroused in connection with Cecil's death, leaves the house. Determined to stay in the neighborhood to protect Kate, he visits the keeper of the lighthouse, where he is followed and trapped in a closet by Leech. Leech, who is in a half drugged condition, is pursued by the vision of the murdered Cecil and upsets the lamp in the lighthouse, causing it to catch fire. The rescuers, guided by the burning building, reach Blunt in time to effect his escape. Upon recovering, Blunt urges Kate to immediate marriage, and they depart for the diamond mines of South Africa, accompanied by three ex-acrobats. Leech later follows and with a band of Arabs abducts Kate and her child. They are rescued by Blunt and the three acrobats, but later, when upon the point of recapture, the acrobats form a span of life by throwing their bodies across a chasm, over which Kate escapes.

Blunt is made prisoner in an Arab camp. Kate, believing him to be dead, returns to England. With the assistance of a Christian Arab girl Blunt manages to escape and makes his way to an English army post. In England Leech's mother finding herself upon the point of death, summons Kate to her bedside, giving her a key to a silver box, indicating that through its contents she can protect herself against Leech. Leech learns of her possession of the box and determines to steal the evidence it contains. He goes to her room at night and is horror-stricken when he discovers the hypodermic needle left in the grapes years ago, which had been found by his mother. Blunt, arriving at the house, is startled by Leech's cry of horror. He hastens to Kate's room and overpowers Leech, who tries to escape, but is confronted with the phantom of his drug-crazed mind by the spirit of Cecil. Before anyone can prevent him, he takes an over-dose of morphine and dies, thus bringing Kate and Blunt together.

THE COMING POWER (Four Parts).—Frank Norman, a young idealist and radical, gains fame and popularity through his speeches, which are inspired by the writings of a young crippled girl—Ruth—who spends her life in an endeavor to bring justice before the eyes of a corrupt political city. Norman is elected candidate for governor upon the Radical ticket. Carter, a financier known as "The Vulture," wishes to control the actions of the possible Governor, but Norman is above bribery. Several clever ruses are resorted to in an attempt to compromise him and place him in Carter's hands, but without success.

Vera, the daughter of Carter's cats-paw, who has met and fallen in love with Norman, is persuaded to use her influence to make Norman accept the bribe. Upon the realization of Norman's contempt for her the girl's better nature is roused and she warns him against his enemies, thus becoming a friend of both Ruth and Norman. Carter, furious at being balked in his designs, plans a frame-up which will place Norman safely in jail and disqualify him in the election. The frame-up is successful—the shooting of a gangster in a saloon being attributed to Norman, who, though realizing that he is in the hands of "The Vulture," is unable to protect himself.

The wounded gangster is placed in a hospital under strict supervision of the politicians, who allow no one to see him. Resorting to a strategy, Norman's political manager, accompanied by the cats-paw's daughter Vera, manages to reach the gangster, obtaining a statement exonerating Norman. Norman is at once released, while a wholesale arrest is made of his enemies. The death of "The Vulture" occurs dramatically when he is confronted by an ex-bookkeeper—an innocent victim who has been railroaded to jail and returned for revenge. The shock causes heart failure, which is fatal.

Norman is elected Governor, but the night of his triumph is saddened by the death of Ruth, who, before dying, indicates her desire to have Vera and Norman marry. A wonderful vision appears to Ruth in which she sees justice prevail at last for the working man, and Truth and Honesty in politics.

THE LITTLE JEWESS (Three Parts).—Isaac Zangwill, a discouraged Jewish book agent, enthusiastic over the tales of fortunes made in America, sails with his wife, Sarah, and daughter of eight on a trading ship to the new land.

A storm wrecks the vessel. The daughter is tied to a mast and cast overboard, in an effort to save her. The mother, half-crazed, leaps after the child into the water and manages to keep afloat. Husband and wife are separated in the water. The husband is picked up by the yacht of a millionaire Jew and is taken to Paris, while the wife and daughter are rescued by an American-bound vessel and befriended by a woman passenger who offers them a home. Both believe the other to have been lost at sea. Attracted by the personality of Zangwill, he is taken into the home of the millionaire to catalogue his library, and interest in his career is created by his faithfulness and intelligence, his employer deciding to give him a start in life.

Zangwill, prosperous under Stern's friendship, being installed as Paris manager in his wholesale jewelry shop. Both he and Sarah have given up hope of ever seeing each other. Rebecca, grown to womanhood, takes her mother to New York; in her efforts to find some clue to her father's fate she becomes interested in detective work. She causes the arrest of Jim Dayton and Eva Lumley, crooks and confederates, who later figure prominently in the story. Zankwill's eyes, under the strain of work, begin to fail, he becoming temporarily blind. A sea voyage and complete rest is prescribed as the only possible chance of restoring his sight. Accompanied by his secretary, Zangwill sails for America in the hope of learning something of his wife and daughter. Dayton, who has seen Zangwill in Paris, recognizes the diamond merchant and plans with his accomplice to rob him. In the meanwhile Rebecca has become a detective in the Secret Service, having risen to a position of importance. Shadowing Zangwill's private secretary, Dayton discovers him to be in search of his missing family. He conceives the idea of substituting Eva as the daughter, gaining access to Zangwill's home and robbing him. Rebecca, who is trying to trap a criminal, overhears the plot of the two crooks; while pretending to be in a drunken stupor, obtains the address of Zangwill's home and plans to save him, unconscious that he is her father. decoys the secretary to his office, locks him in, and proceeds to Zangwill's. Rebecca arrives first at Zangwill's house and hides behind the piano. Dayton gets Eva on the telephone, and she explains the loss of the address, but hastens to the home. Dayton introduces her as Rebecca —Zangwill's long lost daughter. Zangwill finds her features those of a Gentile, but believes Dayton. He describes the wreck, and Rebecca realizes he must be her father. Impatient to get Zangwill's money, Dayton proposes a toast to their reunion. Eva puts a sleeping powder into Zangwill's wine. As he is about to drink it, Rebecca appears from behind the piano, dashes the drugged wine to the floor, skillfully disarms Dayton, summons the police, and delivers Eva and Dayton to them. To Zangwill she recalls a personal incident of the wreck, which establishes her, unquestionably, as his daughter. Husband and wife are reunited; Thornton and Rebecca become mutually interested in each other.

MOTHER'S DARLING LITTLE BOY.—The blue-eyed, curly haired pet of the family, Willie, is the leader of a boy gang up to all sorts of tricks. On this red letter day they find Mr. Tipple Suds, the convivial husband of the fat and efficient washerlady, Mrs. Suds, badly the worse for wear sleeping off a drop too much in the peaceful seclusion of an old wagon seat. The boys run off with the wagon and take the helpless Suds to their cave. Here they tie the prisoner up and concoct a letter to his spouse, demanding thirty cents as the price of their victim's release. This note being placed in the worthy woman's hands, she straightway answers that her husband "isn't worth thirty cents." In the meantime the boys have confiscated the eatables of a picnic party in order to feed their hungry prisoner.

Two tramps, being forcibly rebuffed in their demands upon Mrs. Suds for food, come across the cave by chance. They release the prisoner and find in the cave a banquet to their liking. When the boys come back to their quarters they find the enemy in possession and are forced to forage for liquid refreshments. Seeing their opportunity they concoct a strange mixture, which speedily renders the adult garrison of the cave hors de combat. Then seeking the assistance of the despoiled picnickers they see the the enemy ducked in the pond. That night when the angel child is put to bed by his mother and the evening prayers are said she leaves him, little thinking of the outlaw deeds that have occupied his day.

THE SERPENT OF THE SLUMS (Three Parts).—Nell Walker, a settlement worker, carries on her activities of the slums, completely disregarding and laying aside all the luxuries and opportunities that her parent's wealth offer her. She is brought in immediate contact with that portion of humanity, unknown and unfamiliar to her, but she ministers to the wants of the weak and the poor, in true and unselfish spirit. Her fiancee, Bob Brennan, is against her doing that kind of work, and gives her the preference either to break off the engagement, or give up settlement work. She gives up her fiancee.

Bob meets a beautiful woman who comes from the slums, marries her. On a certain occasion, Bob saves a gambler by the name of Tom from a certain beating, at the hands of a gang, and they become fast friends. Bob introduces Tom to his wife and their friendship turns into an infatuation. Bob's suspicions of his wife surprises the two, and he orders her out of his home. Nell Walker, still doing her settlement work, meets Bob, who on her advice joins "The Society of Suppression of Vice," and they both seem to be thrown together in their work.

To get evidence against his wife, who has become since an owner of a gambling den, Bob masks as an old man who has a new invention, and takes a flash-light of the surroundings so as to make use of same as evidence against his wife. Being frightened at the exposure, Tom and Bob's wife decide to lure him into their place, and dispose of him. They lure him with a letter from a doctor, claiming that his wife is at her death bed, and when he gets there, they overpower him with chloroform, and put him in the basement, where they decide to explode a quantity of dynamite, so as to cover up their murder by blowing up the entire house. Nell Walker learns of the letter, and gathering a party of men to the place, she rescues him just in time from the terrible death, and has the two guilty ones arrested. Getting his divorce, Bob and Nell are re-united again.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE DOCK RATS (Three Parts).—A gang of "Dock Rats" have long eluded the harbor police, and it is now up to Blake to wipe them out. Ordinarily it would have been an easy job, but in this case the power behind this gang is a man of apparent respectability.

From a low, dirty, general merchandise shop there runs a secret tunnel leading to the drawing room of Jasper Jones, a philanthropist and church worker. With him lives Edith, his ward, whom he loves and hopes to marry. This probably would have happened, if Blake had not started on the trail of the "Dock Rats." Blake, disguised as a sailor, feigns an escape from the police and is gladly welcomed by the gang. He is soon one of them, and drinks with them in their vile retreats under the slimy piers. Learning that there is a power behind them, he becomes suspicious of one, Abraham Levi, a wily old dealer in general merchandise.

Blake meets Edith, who soon welcomes his attention, and he soon meets Jasper Jones, her guardian. In the course of events, the police seize an old wreck upon which the "Dock Rats" are trying to get away and there is a desperate struggle for life. The gang manage to get to the pier and try to hide in the tenement section, at hand. The police fearlessly pursue them to the roofs of the buildings, where one of the "Rats" almost sends a policeman to his death, from a hanging rope, but is foiled by a timely bullet from the gun in Blake's hand.

Blake soon discovers that he is on the path of a remarkable criminal. Abraham Levi, bent, dirty, meek and cunning is none other than Jasper Jones, well-to-do and respected by the community. This gives Blake a double motive and he resolves that Edith shall not marry the scoundrel. He sets to work and weaves his net-work of evidence about Jones, alias Levi, until the hour arrives that Jones is to marry Edith.

Just at the moment when the fateful words are to be spoken, the minister removes his wig and there stands Detective Blake.

Jones, realizing that all is over, escapes by a quick move to the den he occupies as Abraham Levi. Determined upon revenge, Jones sets a bomb, but Edith and Blake fortunately are not injured. Blake and the police make their way to Levi's den, where they round up the entire gang of "Dock Rats." Levi is brought to the police station, where Edith is asked to identify him. She swears that she does not know the old man and then Blake, with a quick movement, tears the wig from the face of Levi and there, before the horror-stricken Edith, stands her guardian, Jasper Jones.

A WOMAN WHO DID (Four parts).—A young woman named Katherine works hard in the office of a promising young attorney, Harry Buch, to support herself and to care for her mother. The latter has been ill for some time, and is treated regularly by a young doctor. Katherine falls in love with the doctor, and it is on this account that she refuses to marry her employer, who had proposed to her. During one of the visits of the doctor, Katherine notices a picture in his possession which he says is that of his sweetheart. The condition of Katherine's mother becomes worse, and the doctor decides that an expensive operation is necessary to save her or prolong her life. The girl learns of this, and decides to marry her wealthy employer in order to raise the necessary money, but she voices her true sentiments to the doctor. She promises, however, to try to learn to love her prospective husband. Buch and Katherine are married, and it is through the aid of the lawyer that the operation is performed and the life of the girl's mother is saved.

The couple live happily until Buch becomes entangled in a financial difficulty and loses money which was intrusted to him and for which he was to give an accounting in three years, when the rightful owner would become of age. Not seeing his way clear to make good the loss, the young attorney decided to commit suicide, but is prevented from doing so by his wife, who urges him to go to the mining fields, there try to regain the fortune he lost. Meanwhile, the doctor's fiancee, tired of the length of the engagement, breaks it and marries another man. The doctor, grieved at the loss, takes to drink, loses his practice, and after a series of wanderings, lands in the place to which the lawyer had gone. In the meantime the lawyer's wife gives birth to a son, and having lost her mother, decides to go to her husband. On her arrival, the baby takes sick, and the mother applies to the doctor for medical aid, which is refused because of his hatred for women. As a result the baby dies.

Harry Buch, now a prospector, informs his wife that he has been fortunate in making a good strike. This is overheard by George Fiske, another prospector, who decided to rob Harry of it. Fiske follows him to the mine and there induces him to accept him as a partner, the two to work the mine together, it being Fiske's intention to explode the mine while working it. Harry, however, catches him in the act. A fight ensues which terminates in the explosion of the mine, the death of Harry, and serious injury to Fiske. Harry's wife, on hearing the explosion, goes out looking for her husband, and finds both him and Fiske in one mess. She has her husband buried, but takes George to the house and nurses him. She leaves the house to get aid, but on returning with Dr. Black finds George dead.

Dr. Black persuades her to return to the city and allow him to take care of the mine. Two years elapse. Dr. Black sends Katherine enough money to pay the debts that her husband, the lawyer, had contracted on bonds which were entrusted to him as guardian. Dr. Black, upon receipt of a good offer for the mine, sells it. He writes Katherine, advising her that his profession and heart are calling him to the city. He returns, tells her of his love for her, and they are married.

A MOTHER'S HEART (Four Parts).—L. Hampton, a young lawyer, being in very poor health, is advised by his physician to go to the Canadian wilds on a hunting trip. In accordance with this advice he makes the trip, and under the assumed name of Iveson, joins a hunter's colony. He is introduced to the hunter's daughter, and in a comparatively short time falls in love with her. With the consent of her father, the two are married. Sometime later Hampton is called back to the city by one of his clients to conduct a very important case. He takes leave of the hunter and his wife, giving as a reason for not taking her with him that her customs and crude speech would act against him in the city. He promises, however, to return for her upon completion of the trial.

Upon returning to the city, he is informed by his friends that the trip made a new man of him. He at once takes charge of the case, and in due time, wins it for his client, a beautiful lady, whom he decides to marry, completely forgetting about the wife whom he married under the assumed name of Iveson.

Time passes, the unfortunate daughter of the hunter ever thinking of her husband. After a lapse of fifteen years, her son, tired of life in the woods, decides to go to the city and seek employment. On arrival, he makes the acquaintance of the captain of a barge, the two become fast friends, and young Iveson is engaged by his friend to work on the barge. One day, while the two were in a saloon, the captain happens to flash a big roll of bills, which immediately attracts the attention of one of a number of ruffians. The ruffian kills the captain. In the mixup which ensues, the assailant makes good his escape, while a general tumult follows, after which young Iveson is charged with murder he did not commit. He is held, tried and convicted on so-called "Circumstantial Evidence." Sentence of death is passed by his own father, who had since been elevated to the judiciary. Being quite a popular judge, he is nominated for the office of Governor.

In the meantime, Mrs. Iveson, through a newspaper, learns of the predicament her son is in, and resolves to go to the city in an effort to save him from the death chair. In pleading with the judge for leniency she recognizes in him the man who had deserted her. The recognition becomes mutual. Hampton realizes that a word from the woman would ruin his political career, and endeavors to come to terms with her. There is only one condition on which the woman will maintain silence regarding the unlawful second marriage of the judge, and that is that he sets her son at liberty. This the judge has no power to do, but promises, that after his election to the Governorship, he will pardon young Iverson. Hampton is elected Governor, but neglects to fulfill his promise as to the pardon. Iveson's mother, who left for her home, now returns to the city with the intention of exposing the Governor. While on her way to the executive chambers, she meets the second wife of the Governor and their daughter. After a conversation, the unfortunate mother decides not to ruin the lives of Mrs. Hampton and her daughter, but asks them to use their influence in the securing of the pardon. The pardon is eventually granted and young Iveson is restored to his now happy mother.

THE WISHING RING (Shubert—Five Parts).—Sally, a parson's daughter, though in rags and well ventilated shoes, had artistic instincts and the two vases, though far too rich for her father's church, were flowerless. In her innocence she argued "That man Annesley has an immense rose garden and surely he can spare a few roses for our church," and gathered an armful without the formality of saying "By your leave, sir." Annesley was annoyed, even to the point of anger, at these mysterious disappearances, and finally, during a quarrel with his gardner, the latter threw his apron in Annesley's face and left.

Again, if Giles, the son of the gouty, testy Earl of Bateson, had applied himself more assiduously to his studies instead of making night hideous for the village by his carousals with his boon companions, he would not have been arrested, and expelled from college. On his return home to father, the latter placed him in the hands of a tutor, from whom Giles escaped and arrived at his friend Annesley's rose garden at the psychological moment when the gardener had tendered his resignation. Annesley gave him the apron and placed him in charge of the garden. Sally makes another raid, is caught by Giles, who, from threats, took pity and accompanied her to the forlorn church, where his better nature is aroused. Returning to the garden, they breakfasted al fresco. This acquaintanceship finally ripened into a friendship. During one of their wanderings they happened upon a gypsy camp, where she was told that she will marry a nobleman's son. Giles bought a wishing ring from the gypsies which he gave to Sally. Naturally superstitious, Sally easily construed coincidences as replies to her wishes on the ring. At Annesley's party, Sally and the parson discovered through a letter which the Earl sent, that Giles is his son and must earn a half crown before he can hope for forgiveness. They were astounded and treated him quite deferentially Sally resolved to bring father and son together. She visited the old gent and the Earl was quite impressed with her. She played chess with him—amused him—in fact she became quite essential to him. Her quixotic nature was aroused by the sight of his suffering and wished his cure on the ring. Getting no results, she consulted the gypsies who told her that a certain herb plucked by the light of the moon at midnight and made into a tea is a sure cure for gout. She obeyed the instructions and in reaching down the face of the cliff, fell down and was injured. The following morning a party led by her little dog found her at the bottom of the cliff and took her to her home.

The next morning at ten, when the Earl's little visitor failed to appear, he sent his butler to inquire. On learning that she was injured, he forgot his gout, ordered his horse and set forth to see her. His horse became lame—he stopped at the Inn—ordered a fresh horse, which, by a coincidence, was furnished by Giles, who received a half crown. As the innkeeper gaves Giles the money, he told him that Sally had been injured. Giles took a short cut, arrived before his father, told her of the half crown, hid when his father appeared, and when beckoned on by Sally (who in the meantime had earned the gratitude of the Earl by telling how she was injured) he emerged from his place of concealment, and she brought about the reconciliation.

ONE OF MILLIONS (Dyreda—Four Parts).—Gladimer Kubelow, a young soldier, in whom an adoring mother places all of her love and affection is loved by Maria, a peasant girl. Gladimer divides his heart and soul between the two women who love him. In the very midst of the marriage festivities, the laughter and jests are checked by the entrance of an officer who announces that war is declared. Gladimer realizes the seriousness of what the future may bring, as does his mother, but Maria in the optimism of youth, only thinks of war as a vision of flying flags and the thrill of fife and drum.

A retreating soldier staggers into Gladimer's modest home and announces that a battle is on only a few miles distant. The mother's careworn face is clouded with apprehension for the safety of her boy, but Maria thinks it would be glorious to see a battle, and with several of her girl friends she merrily starts toward the scene of action. However, when they come upon one who has laid down his life for his country, they are crushed by the horror of war's reality. Soon after, one of their own villagers comes to the door and they anxiously crowd around him for news of their boy. Graphically he tells them that the last he saw of their boy was when, wounded, he tried to crawl from the charge of General Blucher's cavalry and how ruthlessly they rode him down.

That night the mother and Maria start out in search of the loved one. When they bring him home dead, Maria's mind snaps under the strain. The mother hurries out to find a doctor. She meets one who stops long enough to give her a drug and explain that three drops will bring her sleep, but more would bring death. While preparing the medicine, soldiers arrive and take possession of her home. They demand food and drink, and while she is serving them another officer enters and announces: "General Blucher, the horses will be ready in the morning." General Blucher has the mother show him to a room and demands that she bring him a bottle of wine. As she places the wine on a tray a look of vengeance steals over her face, and she quickly pours the contents of the vial into the bottle of wine. General Blucher unsuspectingly drinks this down and slowly a paralysis comes over him that spreads so rapidly that his calls for help are ineffective. He crawls from the room to where he finds the crazed bride caressing and talking to her dead soldier. Then the mother enters and tells him of her son and his death, and with a final look of agony, General Blucher falls back dead.

These events have been too much even for the old mother and taking a burning fagot from the fireplace she throws it on to a bed of straw and as the flames rapidly crawl around these poor unfortunates the curtains slowly close, and leave us with a vivid impression of the horrors of war and thankful for the peace that surrounds us.

KEYSTONE.

TILLIE'S PUNCTURED ROMANCE (Six Parts—State Rights Picture).—Tillie, a country maiden, is throwing blocks of wood for her dog to fetch to her. Charlie, a city chap, wanders into range and receives an unusually large block in the middle of his face. Tillie, seeing the stranger is in distress, drags him to her home. Here the stranger discovers that Tillie's father has a bank roll. With threats and promises, he induces her to get the money and go to the city with him. Their first stop is at a cabaret, where Tillie takes the first drink of her young life. Things go along smoothly until they are disturbed by a pretty young damsel, named Mabel, who has followed them since their arrival in the big city. She turns out to be Charlie's city girl, and he, on getting hold of the money that Tillie kept on her person, leaves with her.

Tillie imbibed too freely and was put out into the street. She was then arrested and thrown into jail. Her jailers, discovering her name to be Tillie Banks, telephone to the big millionaire of the city, Douglass Banks, and find that she is his niece whom he has never seen. She is escorted to her uncle's beautiful mansion and here creates such a scene that her uncle disowns her and orders her from the house. No place to go, she looks for a job and secures one as a waitress. Her uncle, being much distressed by the incident, goes away to do some mountain climbing to forget it. Here he takes a terrible fall and his guide, thinking he is dead, telephones to Mr. Banks' secretary, who immediately goes looking for Tillie, who is the only known living relative.

In the meantime, Charlie has made use of the bank roll by dolling up Mabel and himself and they are taking life easy. He and Mabel one day wander into the restaurant where Tillie is working and Tillie, meeting the one who is the cause of her downfall, faints. Charlie and Mabel make their escape, and sitting down in the park to rest, Charlie buys a newspaper, which tells him of the hunt that is on for the missing heiress, Tillie Banks. He immediately sneaks away from Mabel and goes back to the restaurant and explains matters to Tillie's satisfaction and drags her off to a minister, where they are married. On going back to the restaurant they are met by the late millionaire's secretary, who makes known to Tillie that she is an heiress. The heiress and her newly-acquired husband proceed to their new home, the Banks' mansion.

Here they entertain lavishly and a few days later give a grand ball. This ended in a frightful fracas, through the machinations of Mabel, who has managed to secure a position as maid in the household. In the midst of the melee the uncle, who was found to be only slightly injured, returns and has the whole party thrown out into the street. Charlie, discovering that Tillie has nothing in the way of worldly goods, renounces her, and grabbing Mabel's hand, off they go pursued by the now vengeful Tillie. In the excitement that ensues the police of the city are called out as well as the river police, as Tillie has pursued the recreants to the water front, and here in the midst of all the excitement Tillie is struck by an automobile loaded with policemen and she, automobile and load take an awful drop into the river below. Here Tillie is finally rescued and Mabel, seeing the destruction the conscienceless Charlie has wrought, falls into Tillie's arms, imploring her forgiveness, and they both renounce Charlie, as he is dragged away by the police.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode 20—Reels 39 and 40).—When Norton, Florence and the faithful Shep returned to the dock after their exciting battle with the conspirators in the motor boat, as set forth in Episode Nineteen, Norton 'phoned for a taxi and all three, wet and dripping as they still were, piled into it and set out for the Hargreave mansion. As they alighted, a mysterious man, who hid himself carefully in the shrubbery surrounding the house, watched old Jones open the door in response to their ring. While the astonished butler listened to their story, the man darted along the side of the house and peering through the lattice work at the end of the porch, saw Florence hand Norton the paper, which she had taken such desperate risks to obtain, and which she believed held the secret that would free her father from further persecution by the Black Hundred.

Norton put the precious document in his cap and took his leave to return to his rooms and dress, while the spy made haste to report his discovery to Braine. But he did not see Norton, who hurried to change his clothes that he might the sooner be with his sweetheart, take the mysterious paper from his cap and conceal it in his necktie. Nor was he aware that Jones, suspecting his espionage, had loaded two revolvers to be prepared for any emergency that might arise.

So it happened that when Norton was returning to visit his fiancee he was set upon by Braine, the spy and another of the gang. While he lay senseless they hurriedly searched his garments in the hope of finding the precious paper, but without success. Before they had finished the search, Norton recovered consciousness and made a game effort to defend himself. But in this he would have been speedily worsted had not old Jones, hearing the commotion in the garden, ung open a window and fired at the struggling men.

A minute later he was at Norton's side and together they gave chase to the fleeing thugs, who, however, having a good start, easily make their escape. Braine, infuriated by his defeat, upbraided his companions for their obtuseness in not making a more thorough search of Norton's clothes, and then by a roundabout way returned to the Hargreave grounds in the hope that he might yet have an opportunity to get possession of the paper. Through the library window he saw Florence and Norton and the butler examining it.

At first its blank appearance seemed to puzzle them, but suddenly it occurred to one of the three, that the writing might be in invisible ink, which the application of heat would bring out. A candle is procured and holding the paper carefully over its flame, the three are astonished to read the following message:

"Dear Hargreave:

The Russian Minister of Police is stopping at the St. Roland's Hotel under the name of Henri Servan. He is investigating the workings of the Black Hundred and if you could lay before him the evidence that you have, he will be enabled to apprehend them and put an end to the persecution which you have suffered.

Faithfully,
A Friend."

Braine, his eyes glued to the shutter, could not read the message, but he realized that it was important, by the looks of the three interested parties. He saw Florence burn the paper until it was nothing but a heap of ashes, but a quick movement toward the window by the old butler prevented him from seeing more. A short time later, however, when Jones left the house, he followed him.

Left to themselves, Norton and Florence engaged in a worsted-winding match, Florence trying to roll the skein thrown across Norton's arms into a ball, and Norton doing his best to entankle her in its fuzzy lengths, a feat in which he finally succeeded. Meanwhile, neither are aware of the events that have been happening at the St. Roland's Hotel, whither Jones has gone.

There the venerable butler has been closeted for some time with the Russian Minister of Police, to whom he has made himself known by means of a mysterious handshake. With their heads close together, they discuss plans to round up the Black Hundred in thorough fashion, unaware that Braine, who has kept close on Jones' trail, is watching them through the keyhole. The minister decides to consult with one of his agents and when he and Jones go out, Braine lets himself into the apartment with a skeleton key. Once there he makes a quick survey of the premises and going through the papers on the Russian police head's desk, ascertains who he is. But he tarries too long and before he can leave, Jones and the other return.

There is a short, sharp conflict and a moment later Jones and the police official, baffled, vainly attempt to batter down the locked door, while Braine makes good his escape.

CALLED BACK Four Parts).—Dr. Ceneri, in his labors for the liberation of Italy from the Austrian yoke, spends the fortunes, of which, as sole trustee, he has control, of his sister's children, Anthony and Pauline. Pauline, under his guardianship, grows into a beautiful girl, and Macari, one of Ceneri's fellow conspirators in the Garibaldian cause, falls in love with her, but his love is not returned. Anthony is frivolous and extravagant, and as the allowance made him by his uncle is not enough for his wants, he demands a settlement and the control of his own fortune. Ceneri tries to gain time. One night Pauline goes with her brother to the theater. He brings her back to his uncle's house, and when Ceneri comes in, accompanied by Macari and another man—Petroff—Anthony refuses to wait his uncle's convenience any longer.

Pauline goes into an adjoining room, playing and singing softly to herself. A quarrel springs up between Anthony and the other men in the course of which Macari stabs Anthony to the heart. Pauline sees this from her seat at the piano and springs up with a shriek. It is at this moment that Gilbert Vaughan enters the house. Vaughan has been suffering from lenticular cataract and has lost his sight. In a mood of restless depression he leaves his house, intending to walk up and down the pavement outside. Presently he ceases to count his paces, and he finds that he is lost. He asks a belated reveler to take him to his home in Walpole street, but the drunken man really takes him to Horace street. Vaughan's latch-key opens the door of Dr. Ceneri's house. He is arrested by the sound of music and waits by a door, listening to Pauline singing. Suddenly he hears a gurgle and a thud, the music ends in a piercing shriek and, forgetting his blindness, Vaughan dashes into the room. He is immediately made prisoner, but they quickly satisfy themselves that he is really blind. They administer an opiate to him and he is then left in a quiet thoroughfare, where he is picked up by the police. His explanations to his old nurse, Priscilla, are disbelieved. No one believes his story and he ceases to talk of it.

Two years pass. A specialist performs a successful operation and Vaughan's sight is completely restored. One day he is traveling in Italy when a beautiful girl attracts his attention. He follows her into a church and is puzzled to note the strange lifelessness of her beauty. Three months later he sees the same girl and discovers that her name is Pauline March. By chance he makes her acquaintance, but Pauline only answers him in monosyllables. Nevertheless, his infatuation increases, and he boldly asks Dr. Ceneri's permission to marry Pauline. Ceneri at last consents, but two days after his marriage, Vaughan, to his horror, discovers that Pauline's mind is a blank.

Macari, hearing of Pauline's marriage, calls in the hope of profiting by the change in her circumstances. He represents himself as Pauline's brother and tries to enlist Vaughan's aid in recovering from the Italian Government Pauline's fortune, of which he intends to claim one-half. Becoming excited, he takes a knife from the table and stabs heavily on the blotting-pad. Pauline immediately shrieks and faints. Vaughan goes to her aid. Presently she opens her eyes, rises and goes blindly out of the house, followed by her husband. She stops before Dr. Ceneri's old house in Horace street and will not leave the door. To humor her, Vaughan tries his key in the lock. To his surprise the lock turns. They go upstairs through the dusty house and Pauline mechanically sits down at the piano and begins to sing the song he heard on the night of the murder. At the same point the song is broken off, Pauline shrieks and faints. And then by some strange clairvoyance, Vaughan finds that when he holds his wife's hand, he sees the whole scene of the murder, transferred from Pauline's brain to his. He carries Pauline back to her own home, dangerously ill, and accuses Macari of the murder in Horace street. Macari recognizes Pauline's husband as the blind man and cynically admits the crime, but says the man he killed was Pauline's lover and that the blow was struck to avenge his dishonored sister. Vaughan turns him out, but his faith is shaken by the story. Tortured by doubt, he resolves to wrest the truth from Ceneri. He finds that the doctor has been doomed for revolutionary propaganda work to Siberia.

Vaughan visits him there, finds him almost at the point of death among hideous surroundings, and learns that Macari's story is a lie; that the murdered man was Pauline's brother; also that Macari was the traitor who betrayed him and had him sent to Siberia; and, with his dying breath, Dr. Ceneri begs Vaughan to convey that fact to his faithful friend, Petroff. Vaughan returns to London, having first written to Petroff to meet him at his London house. Vaughan learns that his wife has quite recovered her senses. Petroff arrives and Vaughan gives him Ceneri's dying message, and Petroff vows vengeance on Macari. Pauline is in the garden, pondering. She imagines that Dr. Ceneri, through undue influence, induced Vaughan to marry her when she was a half-witted girl and that, therefore, she has no right to wear the wedding ring. Just as she is taking the ring from her finger her husband approaches, and, mistaking the meaning of her action, goes, broken-hearted, back towards the house.

Alone again, Pauline is visited by Macari, who, having heard that her mind has been restored, fears for his own safety. He threatens her. She must keep silent or she shall share her brother's fate. She tries to break away, whereupon he attempts to kill her. The noise brings Vaughan on the scene again. He closes with Macari, and there is a violent struggle. Macari is fast gaining the mastery when Petroff, who from a distance has seen the fight, rushes up and quickly overcomes Macari. He is about to stab Macari when Vaughan intervenes, and Macari makes his escape. Later, Petroff tracks down Macari, and after a desperate struggle, slays him. The story ends with Vaughan and Pauline happily re-united.

PARAMOUNT.

THE COUNTRY MOUSE (Bosworth—Four Parts).—When Billy Balderson and his two cronies, Charlie and Ed, get together on Bill's porch to discuss the high-handed ways in which the railroad is putting it over on the farmers, cross-roads politics develop a latent spring of eloquence, and poor, dowdy little Addie, Billy's wife, thinks that her husband is the most wonderful orator she ever heard.

A few days later they dress up in their second best and go to a meeting on the Common, where George Marshall, suave, well-dressed and condescending, explains to the voters that the railroad is their only hope of salvation and that in the approaching election they should vote for representatives who will support that institution. Billy questions Marshall. The crowd is with Billy, and almost before he knows it he is on the platform, annihilating Marshall's argument in a rousing speech. Between excitement and pride Addie is reduced almost to hysterics, and when Charlie, seizing the psychological moment, nominates Billy for the Legislature, she is nearly overcome. The most exciting days of her hard-working, colorless life follow, culminating in the fete day when Billy entertains all the townsmen at their farm to celebrate his election.

With their arrival at the State Capitol a new era begins, and Addie soon learns that the years of drudgery and plain living on the farm are poor preparation for coping with the political circle of the State Capitol. Shy and bewildered, and lacking the poise that a sense of his position gives Billy, she quickly finds herself outstripped by him in adapting themselves to the changed conditions of their lives.

Addie can only look nervously about and wish she was at home; as she and Billy attend their first reception and she notices the covert laughter of the people about them. Two persons notice them particularly—George Marshall, the speaker Billy answered during the campaign, and his wife, Myrtle. As Billy is recognized as a coming man, and his vote will be needed on an impending railroad bill, Marshall quietly gives his instructions to Myrtle, then recalls himself to Billy, and tries to put him and the embarrassed Addie at their ease.

Taken up by the Marshalls, Billy makes rapid progress in the social life of the capitol, but only until Addie learns that Mrs. Marshall is monopolizing her Billy's time, and that she herself is looked upon by the women of the political circle as a poor little frump with no spirit.

With a blank signed check from Billy, she calls in the services of Mme. Pauline, proprietor of a beauty parlor, and the result is so astoundingly transforming that she can hardly believe her eyes. She passes Billy on the street and he does not know her, though the thought flashes through his mind that his little country mouse of a wife might have looked like that, if———! When he reaches home, there is Addie, still the little, dowdy country mouse, who seems to shrink from the very thought of the reception and ball to which they are invited, and who later sees him off to it with an air of relief. The relief at least is not feigned, for it has been hard work to keep Mme. Pauline and her maid quiet in the kitchen, while she gets Billy out of the way.

The transformation takes place quickly, and the country mouse appears at the ball as a wonderfully charming and brilliant woman. Marshall is distinctly impressed, and so ardently seized the opportunity of persuading Addie to influence Billy's vote on the railroad bill, that Billy is furiously jealous. The denouement is cleverly turned to a comedy finish and the play closes happily as Addie begins to teach her husband the tango.

THE MAN FROM MEXICO (Famous Players—Five Parts).—Clementina Fitzhew decides to spend a night with her mother but happening to overhear her husband planning a wonderful time at the Cafe Cleopatro with his friend and boon companion, Majors, she determines to follow them to the gay cafe and watch hubby. Fitzhew and Majors betake themselves in blissful ignorance to the Cleopatra, and proceed to partake not wisely but too well of the flowing bowl. A picture of Clementina falls from Fitzhew's wallet, and is seized by Paquita, a Spanish dancer, who keeps it to tease Fitzhew. Majors persuades Fitzhew to leave while still able to walk, and as they depart Clementina, veiled, accompanied by Farrar, the District Attorney's nephew, who is in love with Sallie, Fitzhew's sister, enter. At this juncture the place is raided, and Clementina and Farrar manage to escape, after giving fivtitious names to the police; but Clementina's fface is seen by Louis, the waiter, who is arrested because he refuses to give her description to the officer. On his way home the joyful but unsteady Fitzhew engages in battle with a cabman, and Fitzhew and the cabby are arrested and taken to court, where Fitzhew talks too much and is given thirty days on the Island. When Fitzhew finally realizes what has happened, he is at his wits' end to account for the thirty days' absence to his wife, and being allowed by the authorities to say farewell, tells her he is going to Mexico for a month. Clementina, afraid of being apprehended on account of the raid, and not wishing anyone to know of her own jaunt, is with difficulty restrained from going with him.

From now on, Fitzhew's adventures on the "Island," among his fellow-prisoners, his attempts to play on the love of the District Attorney's nephew for Sallie, his discovery that the Warden has the picture of Clementina, stolen by Paquita, and is in love with Mrs. Fitzhew, his hungry attempts to steal food from the other convicts, his meeting with Louis, the waiter at the Cleopatra, who wants to kill the warden and escape, the visit of Clementina to the prison not knowing her husband is there, and the melodramatic jail delivery, culminating in Fitzhew's triumphant recapture of the escaping prisoners and his congratulations by the authorities, leave nothing to be desired in the way of mirth-provoking situations. His return home at the end of thirty days in Mexican costume, with a handbook of the Spanish language; his getting into more tangles, and cleverly getting out again; and his hoodwinking Clementina to the end, furnish the funniest finish to one of the funniest farces ever written.

JESSE L. LASKY.

READY MONEY (Lasky—Five Parts).—Stephen Baird, a mining engineer and popular man-about-town, goes west to seek his fortune. Arriving at Gallup, a mining town, he becomes acquainted with Mike Reardon. They set out in quest of gold.

While making camp, the first night out, they come across the abandoned workings of the Skyrocket mines. Steve decides to explore it. Finding a piece of rock, which he believes contains gold, he pursuades Mike to look it over, and although Mike is certain that it is worthless, he goes about his work in a business-like manner and comes to the conclusion that the tunnels have been driven in the wrong direction. On the strength of their conviction, Steve goes to the owner of the property and purchases it for thirty thousand dollars, of which he pays one-third down, and he immediately leaves for New York to secure the remaining $20,000 to complete the purchase.

James Morgan, a mining operator of doubtful character, who owns mines adjoining the Skyrocket, discovers through the development of his own property that a vein of ore in his mine extends on through the claim controlled by Steve, and then learns that Steve is the owner of the Skyrocket property. In New York, Steve has made the acquaintance of Jackson Ives, with plenty of money, who agrees to purchase fifty thousand dollars' worth of stock in Steve's mine.

New Year's Eve comes and finds Steve downhearted and melancholy, but Jackson Ives fulfills his promise and gives Steve fifty thousand dollars for an interest in the property. Steve's friends, including Grace Tyler, come to the apartment to try and persuade him to join them at a party, and seeing Steve with fifty thousand dollars in bills, lying on the desk, they immediately assume that he has struck gold and implore him to accept their checks in payment for stocks in his company, which they had heretofore refused to purchase.

Jackson Ives, for a number of years, had been suspected by the Government as a counterfeiter, but the detectives had never been able to catch him "with the goods." On this particular night they had trailed him from the hotel to Steve's apartment and break in on them just as Ives gives the huge bundle of bills to Steve. By using a little strategy, Steve is enabled to slip the money into an envelope, addresses it to Grace Tyler, his sweetheart, and slips it into a mail pouch. After a thorough search of the room, finding nothing the detectives depart and Steve and Ives join the party in a restaurant.

Meanwhile, Mike Reardon, with increased force, is working night and day to discover gold. Morgan learns this and, fearing that Reardon will uncover the vein of ore which he knows to be there, causes an explosion in the Skyrocket mine, which instead of acting as an injury uncovers the huge vein of gold, the report scatters and wealth pours in on Steve and Mike and their partners. Jackson Ives, instead of being a counterfeiter, is proven a man of unlimited wealth, and despite the activities of the secret service officers he proves his honesty and, becoming a partner of Steve's, remains by his side even when Steve takes Grace Tyler in his arms and asks her the all-important question, to which she smilingly answers, "Yes, dear."

Her collapse under the burden of her troubles, her recovery and the acknowledgment by her father, coupled with Durward's loyalty, form a climax well in keeping with Mary Jane Holmes' novel of the same name.

You can increase your business

In your line, just as in any other line, modern up-to-date methods increase the profits.

It's the reputation for good pictures that counts at the box office.

Your film service may be good, but the pictures cannot be shown as they should be, unless you have the right kind of light.

The Mercury GE Arc Rectifier changes, a.c. to d.c. and therefore will give you the most brilliant, snappy, "talked about" pictures it is possible to get—far and away ahead of anything you could ever get with any a.c. arc.

With the Rectifier the light is steady, intensified, more of it is directed right on the lens, pictures are whiter and brighter and flicker is practically done away with.

Further, your cost for current is considerably decreased—many rectifier users say the saving is as high as 50%.

And did you ever consider the advertising value of a Rectifier in front of your house.

Yes—you can increase your business by good "service" to the public.

Booklet B3274 explains the operation of the Rectifier and gives other information worth knowing. Our projecting engineers will gladly co-operate with you any time.

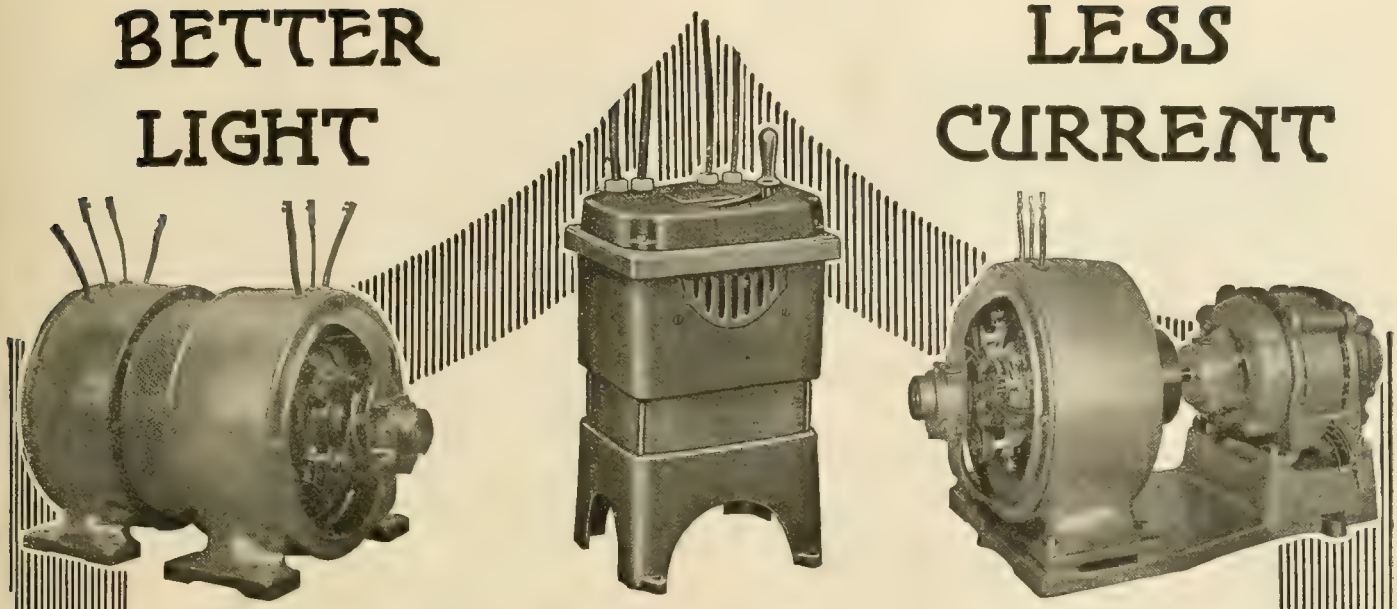
BETTER LIGHT LESS CURRENT



The DC Compensarc lowers the voltage of a direct current supply to that required at the lamp without needless waste.

The AC Compensarc cuts ⅔ from your lighting bill if you use alternating current.

The AC to DC Compensarc will transform alternating into direct current and reduce the voltage at the same time without needless waste.

No matter what current you have---Alternating or Direct---or what voltage or frequency, one of the will enable you to secure a light that will give those clear, bright pictures that everybody now demands.

What's the use of paying extra money for special screens, projecting machines, and first run films and then spoil the whole result with poor light? With the Fort Wayne Compensarcs you can get any kind of light you want regardless of the kind or quality of your current supply.

The Compensarcs will give you

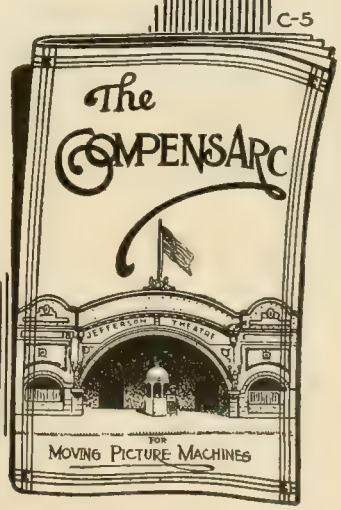
STEADY LIGHT. No flickering, no sputtering, even when changing intensities or from one machine to another.

WHITE LIGHT. No yellow streaks, no ghosts.

BRIGHT LIGHT. Three times the light with two-thirds the current.

They are safe, efficient, easy to operate, fool proof and reliable.

C-5



Compensarcs are so commonly found in motion picture theatres that many people now call all current saving and transforming devices by that name.

MOTIOGRAPH
PROJECTION IS UNEXCELLED

Note the sharp, clear pictures—compare them with other machine projections—see for yourself. There is a vast difference in the Motiograph projection and when you speak of up-keep—the MOTIOGRAPH has no equal. Its hardened parts will last many years longer, which is spoken of by all users.

THE GRAPHOSCOPE

Motion Picture Machine is built around a new mechanical principle which gives rock-steady, flickerless pictures, yet permits a shutter opening of more than 90%, as against 40% in other high-grade machines.

Mr. C. Francis Jenkins of Washington, one of the engineer-designers of the GRAPHOSCOPE, stands alone in having been twice honored by scientific bodies for original research work in the motion picture art. He was awarded the Elliott Cresson gold medal by the Franklin Institute for the invention of the first successful motion picture projecting machine. His old experimental apparatus, acquired many years ago by the Federal Government, is on exhibit in the U. S. National Museum at Washington.

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

The last of the great Indian fighters are the leading players in this most realistic film of the age. Nothing more picturesque, more thrillingly entertaining was ever staged. Nothing to equal it will, perhaps, ever be done again. No boy, girl or grown-up should be allowed to miss this picture.

This Means Nobody But You

. . . . The article on the opposite page is the fiftieth of a series of editorials, by Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., published every week in "The Universal Weekly," a 36-page magazine which every exhibitor should read, no matter whether he is using Universal films or not.

. . . . You are welcome to a free trial of this magazine.

. . . . Mr. Laemmle's "straight-from-the-shoulder talks" are by far the best printed help that has ever been given to picture exhibitors.

. . . . They deal with every branch of the film industry.

. . . . They show its strength and its weaknesses, its great possibilities and its great dangers.

. . . . They tell the plain truth so pungently, and deal with actual conditions so frankly that they are at times staggering.

. . . . They contain many statements that the Universal cannot publish in its advertising in the trade papers because it would offend other advertisers.

. . . . The Universal does not expect the trade papers to fight its battles.

. . . . It is perfectly capable, and willing to fight its own.

. . . . That's what makes "The Universal Weekly" so intensely interesting.

. . . . It is making exhibitors think along lines they never thought on before.

. . . . It is making the whole film business an open book to them.

. . . . It is the talk of the trade.

. . . . You ought to have it.

. . . . You are welcome to a free trial.

. . . . Just send your name and address to the editor of "The Universal Weekly," 1600 Broadway, New York.

A BENEDICTION

(No. 50. Straight-from-the-Shoulder Talks by Carl Laemmle, President.)

I SAW today a four-reel picture that was a benediction. It breathed goodness, purity, truth. The very simplicity of its story had a charm that words cannot describe. I sat through the whole four reels, enthralled, but not excited; thankful, but not thrilled. All the rest of this day (it is now nearly bedtime) I have been a better man. I have not felt like pulling the hair of some one who manifested stupidity. I have not had a bit of hate in my heart. Tonight I am going to crawl into my bed and have a peaceful sleep. I know from the bottom of my heart that I will not dream ghastly dreams. I will not be sliding over a jagged precipice in my B. V. D.'s. I will not be running down the middle of Broadway in my pajamas. I will not dream that I am swimming in a bathing suit that persists in shrinking. I will not see purple ichthyosauri gambolling on top of the mantel piece in the living room. I will not dream of studios burning; nor of actors blown up by dynamite; nor of stage directors tearing their hair and mine.

I will sleep. I feel calm and strangely contented. I FEEL AS THOUGH A BENEDICTION HAD BEEN BREATHED OVER AND INTO MY WHOLE BEING.

And think of it! The four-reel picture which has enriched my goodness and impoverished my hate DOES NOT CONTAIN A SINGLE "PUNCH."

Not once is a hero thrown over a cliff! Not once is the leading lady tied hand and foot! Not once is there a fire scene, a boat wreck, a murder, a mystery, a battle scene or anything else that is deemed so essential to the success of a feature picture nowadays! And yet this four-reel feature held me as in a vise; and it gripped the members of the National Board of Censors who saw it when I did; and it showered a wealth of GOOD FEELING over the members of the Universal staff who saw it!

Here's something totally different and something totally unexpected! Just when you expected us to startle the world with something sensational, we produced something that will startle it because of its LACK of sensationalism.

THAT'S WHAT KEEPS THE UNIVERSAL AHEAD! We are not stereotypes. We disapprove of hackneyed methods. Let others stupidly follow the beaten path, and in the end they will find themselves AS BEATEN AS THE PATH. Those who use their legs instead of their brains will pay for it with their dollars.

The four-reeler in question is going to GIVE A TREMENDOUS UPLIFT TO EVERY EXHIBITOR WHO SHOWS IT. It is gong to silence the chatter of fanatics who damn all moving pictures up and down and claim they are breeders of crime and immorality.

It is not a sermon. It is not a sickish, goody-goody treatise on how to be happy, though good. It is not mawkish sentimentality for falsetto-voiced men or pop-eyed marms.

It is just a great big little bit of a sweet, simple story; written by one of the leading thinkers of the day; wrought into scenario form by one of the brightest minds I have ever come in contact with; produced by one of the few really great stage directors of the times; and enacted amid beautiful surroundings by one of the cleverest and most satisfying groups of actors and actresses ever brought together in one picture.

The author is Mrs. Clara Louise Burnham.

The scenario was done by Lois Weber, whose name in every-day life is Mrs. Phillips Smalley.

The stage director is Otis Turner.

The leading roles are enacted by Miss Anna Little, Mr. Herbert Rawlinson, Mr. William Worthington, Mr. Frank Lloyd, Miss Betty Schade and Miss Cora Drew.

The title is "The Opened Shutters."

It will be released on the regular Universal program Tuesday, Nov. 17th—yes, on the Regular Universal Program! The Universal Weekly will tell you the details.

It is a benediction, and it is one of the many, many reasons why I have been urging you to cast off the old yoke which has kept your business from enjoying its natural expansion. I refer to the yoke of low rental prices. Go to the nearest Universal exchange NOW, indicate your willingness to pay a higher price than you ever paid in your life for film service and INSURE YOUR FUTURE!

Thousands of American newspaper readers are engaged in "watchful waiting" for that latest, greatest Universal Serial, "THE MASTER KEY," written by John Fleming Wilson for their favorite papers and appearing for fifteen weeks in their favorite theatres. Is yours a favorite theatre? Have YOU booked this master serial? It is costing the exchanges a record sum and you must expect to pay extra for it. Remember, Robert Leonard and Ella Hall are the stars, the picture is the most massive and mysterious ever known in the serial line and the first installment releases the week of November 16th—that's SOON!

A Thrilling Story of Mystery and Romance!

FIFTEEN WEEKS THIRTY REELS UNIVERSAL MOVING PICTURES

"Not the Cheapest Serial but THE GREATEST"

Some Battle Scenes!

The second of J. WARREN KERRIGAN'S "Terence O'Rourke" adventures

—"THE EMPIRE OF ILLUSION," 2 reel regular Victor of Monday, Nov. 25—called for a fierce French attack on the Arabs. Here's where Universal Luck entered: Following the breaking out of the European war, great numbers of Frenchmen, from various points along the Pacific Coast, drifted into California, with the hope of securing admission to the French army and passage to Europe. Quite a few of them were taken and transported east and on to Europe, as they were members of the reserve classes called to the colors. But many of them were left behind, because they either did not come within the age limit or were naturalized Americans. These men found themselves out of work, stranded, away from home. And they were trained fighters. We snapped them up for the "French side" in the battle scenes AND YOU NEVER SAW SUCH GENUINE, STIFF FIGHTING IN ALL YOUR LIFE! YOUR PATRONS WILL TALK ABOUT THESE FIGHT SCENES FOR MONTHS AND MONTHS!

A Play That's Beloved!

—"HUMAN HEARTS!" The title brings up memories, we wager! One of the most popular plays of the day when melodrama was all the rage—founded on the kind of story that will never die, a story OF human hearts, written to appeal TO human hearts. KING BAGGOT has taken this rich, old melodrama and made it into a glorious Imp three-reeler. Baggot plays Tom Logan, the innocent blacksmith, of course. And this fine part shows him at his absolute best. The release date is Wednesday, Nov. 25th.

That Night Photography!

—We knew it! Everybody is now trying for successful "night photography." Just the intimation that Universal triumphed in that direction AND OTHER PRODUCERS ARE ANNOUNCING, OR WILL ANNOUNCE SHORTLY, PICTURES TAKEN AT NIGHT! Maybe they'll be good pictures, too; but it is a matter of record that UNIVERSAL WAS FIRST. The pioneer night film is Bison's "The Brand of His Tribe," released Saturday, Nov. 28th.

"Animated" the Only Weekly!

—Every other film weekly is out of it alongside the "ANIMATED." We admit that they all have enterprise to burn BUT IT'S THE "ANIMATED" THAT IS SCOOPING THE COUNTRY ON TOPICAL PICTURES WEEK IN AND WEEK OUT. Now, it's results that count, isn't it? We admire our competitors' skill, resources and fighting ability, and so must you; but if "ANIMATED" makes 'em all look sick in the results department, you must book the weekly with the best news-in-film, which is the "ANIMATED!"

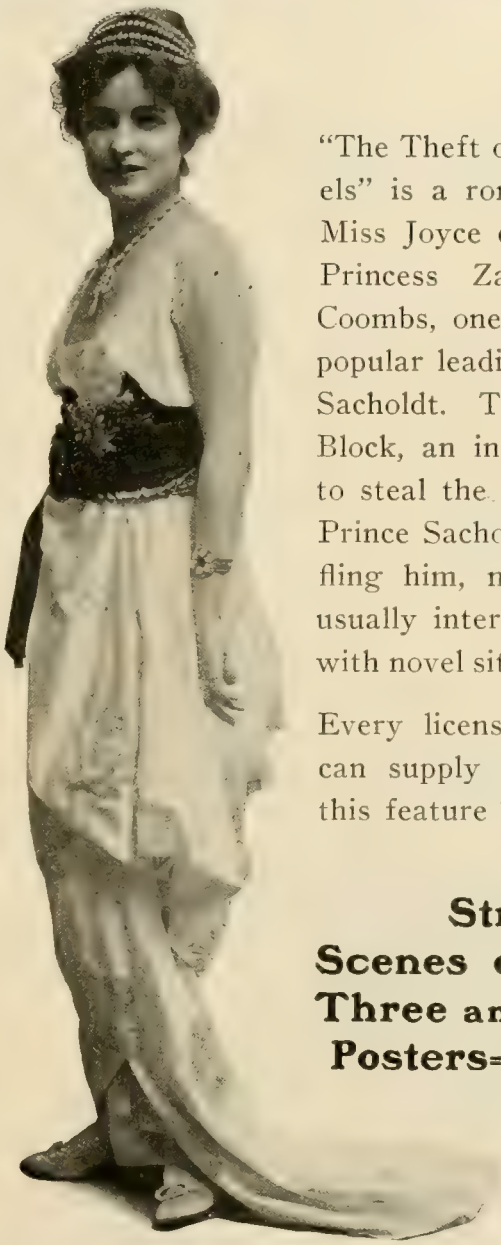
The Theft Of the Crown Jewels

The $1,000,000 Jewel Production



Photoplay patrons everywhere will be eager to see the tremendous fortune shown in this extraordinary production. ALICE JOYCE, clad in a million dollars' worth of genuine gems and a three-thousand-dollar gown, makes this the greatest attraction you have ever shown in your theatre.

Miss Joyce is the only living person who has worn so great a fortune at one time. Lebolt & Company of Fifth Avenue, New York, loaned the gems to Kalem for this production. The gown was designed by "Lucile" (Lady Duff-Gordon), America's foremost modiste.

"The Theft of the Crown Jewels" is a romance of royalty. Miss Joyce enacts the role of Princess Zavia, while Guy Coombs, one of Kalem's most popular leading men, is Prince Sacholdt. The efforts of Von Block, an international crook, to steal the crown jewels and Prince Sacholdt's work in baffling him, make this an unusually interesting story filled with novel situations.

Every licensed film exchange can supply you—arrange for this feature TO-DAY.

A black curtain. On one side the figure of death. On the other the figure of peace. A dark curtain forms the background at the head of a flight of stairs.

A thin stream comes from underneath the sombre hangings. It widens out, spreads, trickles down step by step and forms the word "WAR."

That is the prelude to the strongest, the most gripping and forceful photoplay that has ever been aimed at the needless sacrifice of human lives.

You lose the sense of the gruesomeness of the start in the vividness and the humanity of the story and its action.

If ever there was a great indictment of war—it is this. If ever there was a play whose lesson will be appreciated NOW—it is "ONE OF MILLIONS."

It has been staged by the Master, J. Searle Dawley. It is portrayed in a way that will make your heart beat in sympathy with its story.

It is a play that will crowd your house and will be talked about for days after it is shown.

THE KING'S MOVE IN THE CITY

Being an Adventure of Lord Stranleigh

By ROBERT BARR

Lord Stranleigh's meeting with Lady Sinclair brought the young nobleman out of the atmosphere of boredom which had surrounded him for a long time, and he soon found that life was really worth living after all. His proposal to her was met, however, with a declaration on the young lady's part that until he should prove himself really worthy by accomplishing some real good in life, she could not entertain his suit. On his way home from a reception his first opportunity occurred as they passed a house on fire. But his bravery didn't satisfy her. Later on possessed of an enormous fortune, he heard of the McKellers who had been caught in a mining scheme and were about to be swindled out of their investment. The McKellers were in despair when young John Hazel happened to drop into the office. On learning the facts in the case, Hazel insisted upon giving Peter a card of introduction to Lord Stranleigh. Peter called upon the young nobleman and explained the whole affair. Stranleigh at once decided upon a scheme. Accompanying Peter to his father's office, he told him to give orders to twenty brokers to buy in a certain amount of stock when offered, and in this manner, not only was the scheming group defeated, but the market value of the property was greatly enhanced.

Facts and Comments

WITH this issue of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD we are beginning the publication of a Digest of Motion Picture Laws. While no degree of perfection is claimed for this digest it does contain many points of information which we hope will be useful to our readers. We repeat here the advice urged in the brief introduction to the digest and suggest to all readers who are interested to be sure and keep copies of it for future reference. Many editions of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD containing special information have been depleted and reduced below the copies we like to keep in our own office because of strong special demands for certain issues.

WE THANK the friends and readers who have taken the trouble to write us that they commend the stand of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD in refusing to advertise objectionable films. One of our subscribers says: "I hope every exhibitor who is a reader of your magazine appreciates as we do the genuine help you are giving us." We still think that the publisher who takes money for advertising such films makes himself a party to a traitorous offence against the welfare of the entire industry. A general preachment against indecent pictures is a barren proceeding, when the advertising columns are thrown open to the objectionable picture. Such an attitude is, if we remember the substance of the Biblical teaching, somewhat hypocritical. The sincerity of opposition to bad pictures is proven and tested not only in the editorial sanctum but likewise in the counting room. The latter test is the crucial one.

WE URGE every exhibitor to be on his guard against violently partisan war films. Men who could not possibly produce a film which will appeal to the public on its merits try to reach success by indirect and not always creditable routes. There has been too much of this pro-British and pro-German agitation. The screen ought to remain neutral or pro-American which is much the same thing. No exhibitor can make money with a film which must needs offend some part of his audience. The honeyed words or the importunities of the booking agent sometimes make the exhibitor forget his first duty: screen examination of his program before his public sees it. Screen examination of war films is a duty which no exhibitor can afford to neglect. One or two particularly offensive pictures are now being offered to exhibitors, hence the necessity of double vigilance at this time.

AN IMPORTANT decision affecting the ownership of dramatic productions and the rights growing out of such ownership has recently been rendered by the Appellate Division of the first department in this state. The father and heir of the late Clyde Fitch had intended to reproduce on the screen some of the plays of his son which had been sold to Charles Frohman. Frohman contended that such a step would infringe upon his rights and the court sustained his position. The plays having been sold to one party, all the rights flowing from the ownership were, according to the decision, naturally included in the contract of sale. This decision does in no way alter or interfere with a decision recently rendered in a Federal Court where it was held that the dramatic rights and the motion picture rights of a novel may be sold separately. Of course there is no reason why the author of a play may not sell it both to the producer of the speaking stage and to the producer who uses the screen as a medium of dramatic expression. A play sold outright without restriction or qualification includes the motion picture rights it would seem as a matter of course.

TWO ministers in a suburban part of New York are up in arms against an exhibitor of motion pictures because they "cannot countenance competition of motion pictures with church club activities." One of the reverend gentlemen remarks that he is "not against all motion pictures." He says he does not like "those of a melodramatic character." Frankly speaking we do not like them either, but that does not mean that our taste ought to be raised to the dignity of a legal edict and that the men, women and children who take pleasure in melodramatic films ought to be arrested or kept at home. Anathema and excommunication have always seemed the poorest kind of spiritual weapons to our way of thinking. Let the protesting pastors use their moral influence to improve the good taste of their flocks. An occasional lively and entertaining program minus the melodrama might help a little. The clergyman has the same chance to attract and hold his young people as the exhibitor.

Stage and Book to Screen

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

A MERE glance at past conditions is all that is necessary to make us realize that moving pictures have fought their own way against literary skepticism and theatrical prejudice, have found their own way to universal popularity in spite of the fact that few writers ever gave them support and that they were regarded with mingled envy and disdain by exponents of the "legitimate." It is now quite satisfying for authors to have their works visualized, and gentlemen of the theater are tumbling over one another to convert comatose scripts into live assets. Some disputes have arisen as to ownership of these embalmed products. Men who acquired dramatic rights, at a time when that meant their oral exposition on the stage in three or four acts, attempt ownership of silent visualization in two hundred scenes on the screen.

The stage offers one vehicle, the book another, and screen representation another, each distinct from the other, each unique in its way.

If no one reserved rights of screen production, if they were not mentioned in agreements, is it not difficult for any man who has grasped the full meaning of this new art to see how it becomes involved unless offering a mere reflection of an older art. The two arts stand in a relation to each other like that of all arts,—that of separate means of expression, each with its own structure and treatment, but it is not impossible that courts, absorbed in technicalities, detached from equity by precedent, may reach a decision against ownership by the author of what his mind has created.

The courts may rule that in selling one form of expression an author has disposed of all other forms, especially one so poor in vocabulary as to depend upon the word "dramatic."

When a judge is not progressive, when he is guided less by what should be than by what has been, it is not to be expected that the immediate future will offer anything conclusive as to the proper relation of stage rights to those of camera visualization, but it is wholly within my province to offer some information on the subject, in view of the fact that I have transcribed quite a number of photostories from other sources of publication than those of the screen. From poems, from novels, from scripts of stage plays, I have taken the author's idea and constructed this or that scenario of an entirely new play, sometimes keeping along original lines for atmosphere, at all times adding a very large part—at least one-half—of the material necessary for successful screen portrayal.

Who owns the story?

Some book-publishing concerns unwittingly admit that the author does by asking him to assign all rights to them, meaning both those of stage and of screen production. If a comprehensive implication was involved by book publication, there would be no need of an effort to secure all rights. It seems to be clearly implied that there are other rights, that one specific form of publication does not embrace the others. To attempt ownership through legal technicalities may be expected—it is common enough—and the application of ancient principles may be made to modern conditions, but it would seem to be a matter of natural justice to regard any creative work as primarily the property of its creator.

Consider a few facts.

The structure of a stage play differs widely from that of the photostory.

One depends largely upon vocal utterance which is entirely absent in the other.

One is necessarily artificial and nearly always arbitrary in form; whereas the other may easily be natural and logical in its development.

These particular and distinctive characters appear to give the younger art an individuality of its own, though, like literature, it may possess an intrinsic relationship to the drama. It is certainly developed and maintained as a separate art. The fact that its interests and concerns are those of any vehicle of thought should not give rise to any confusion. That is a kinship of idealization. The art itself, the employment of given means to effect a purpose, has grown along entirely new lines and reached its strong place in the hearts of people through the novelty of its presentation. That its stories may go straight to the minds of people without the intervention of words, places it beyond subordinate classification under literature or the drama.

In transposing from books or stage plays, the author of a large screen version may well keep in mind that the book may be laid aside and that there are intermissions between acts at the theater, whereas the attention of an audience must be compelled for nearly two hours in a five-reel presentation. The handful of main characters should be clearly defined in the author's mind at the outset and introduced to the audience at the earliest possible moment. On the strength of this introduction hinges sympathetic attention. Now a question arises as to how much they are to influence the course of events—a question of their intelligence and native power, and how much chance and fate are to influence them.

Along with the introduction of these main characters, to be gathered from two or more sources, comes the development of incidents which bring them together along a single line of interest leading up to a climax. To introduce principals late in a story is dangerous. People know there is to be a clash of some kind and exhibit a deeper interest when enabled to range themselves for and against the opposing forces. Still, in rare cases, particularly those involving a fascinating central figure, it is possible to conduct a series of adventures toward a given end, but such plays often peter out before that end is reached. I do not believe, however, in imposing any limitations upon the author of a five-reel photodrama—the materials at his disposal are usually inadequate and often unsuited to the strong enforcement of an idea.

Because of a tremendous demand for good features there are few miserable failures where there has been adequate treatment in the transposition. Beauty of scene, delightful personality of interpreters, fine scientific work,—all these offer compensation for mediocrity of play structure, but there has been no striking or brilliant success without able authorship in the background. There are quite as many fundamentals to be mastered and absorbed in getting a play ready for visualization as in preparing a novel for publication, aside from command of language. There the novelist has an advantage—the treatment is his own. There is one note which cannot be sounded too often, that of sincerity. Sincerity of authorship, direction and interpretation counts, and there is very little artistic sincerity back of the desire to pick up a little easy money. The man who puts his heart and soul into authorship at this stage may not reap large rewards, but he will build a reputation bound to count heavily in the end.

New Theatres---New Exhibitors

By W. Stephen Bush.

IN THE great evolution of our industry, going on in plain sight of all who care to look, two facts stand out with unmistakable distinctness: One the profound change in the character of the theaters now devoted to the showing of motion pictures, the other the equally profound change in methods of presentation. These changes are perhaps most notable in the larger cities. Six or seven years ago one could count the little places located along and amid the arteries of the city traffic by the dozen and often by the score. Today these little places have largely disappeared, having been supplanted by fewer bigger and far more substantial structures. The building of modern theaters specially devoted to motion pictures has indeed become a distinct branch of architecture. Examining the plans and specifications for the erection of such theaters and looking at the best picture theaters now in existence we are struck with the elaborate provisions made for the comfort of patrons, with the special attention given to women and children, with the extraordinary care to insure a maximum of safety both to the employees in the booth and to the public and last, but not least, with the amount of thought bestowed on the problem of projection.

The subject of decoration is justly deemed one of the utmost importance in a motion picture house, and we know for a fact that the leading decorators in this country have been frequently called into consultation. Moving picture architecture also aims at a perfect control of the lighting system which makes possible the fullest use of light as an aid to a proper presentation of the pictures. All indications point to solidity and permanency. We know of no field in which new and clever ideas of construction are surer of their reward than in the building of motion picture theaters. Unless all signs fail, the motion picture theater of the future will be not the least wonderful development of an industry which has made the wonderful itself seem commonplace.

When I examined moving picture conditions abroad a little more than a year ago, it seemed to me as if in the construction and equipment of theaters we were somewhat behind London, Berlin and Paris. Today this country undoubtedly leads the world by a safe margin in the number of modern, large and well appointed moving picture theaters. One of the most remarkable phases of this growth is to be found in the fact that old theaters which were never intended for motion picture audiences have lately been avoided by exhibitors. Everybody seems to realize thoroughly that the motion picture must have a home which is distinctly its own and that it cannot be shown to advantage in quarters which are not suitable in every respect.

If the new departure in the construction of motion pictures means much, the changes and improvements in the method of presentation are equally important and absolutely essential to the healthy growth of the industry itself. It has been said by a distinguished and successful director of motion pictures that the exhibitor is expected to be the "realizer of the producer's ideals." At a time when the producer's ideal was to sell an equal number of copies of all his negatives, wholly and contemptuously irrespective of the difference in quality, the saying just quoted meant little or nothing. If it had any significance at all it meant that the exhibitor must take a maximum of reels conscientiously using everything which came in the course of his regular service.

Happily for all of us these days have passed never to return. They were the results of temporary conditions and I do not believe that even the men who at that time profited so handsomely by these conditions, can now be desirous of returning to them. In the present condition of the producing branch of our industry "realizing the producer's ideals" means a good deal. Dozens of producers are undoubtedly aiming at quality, regardless of present cost. They feel that the stability of the motion picture as a favorite popular amusement at this time depends wholly upon quality. They know that the hundreds of new theaters now going up all over the country and playing to increasing audiences must have quality. Hence, we have in the midst of a most unwholesome over-production, a considerable number of high class film productions. These are the productions which make it possible for the exhibitor to capitalize his talent, his skill and his experience. These high-class productions, supplied in sufficient quantities, must eventually destroy the evils of a daily change. Needless to say, the daily change reduces the possibilities of presentation to a minimum. It also creates an unhealthy taste for constant change in the audience. On the other hand, the high-class production, like the legitimate attraction in its best days, fosters and develops the taste for quality in the audience.

Never before in the history of motion pictures has originality held out greater rewards to the exhibitor. It is an open race, free to all who think they can run well enough to be near the front at the finish. The man who sticks to the conventional and who insists on doing tomorrow just exactly what he did yesterday will, despite the fine theater and even despite the fine pictures, find himself distanced in the race. The men who have the crude notions of "showmanship" as it was practiced a generation ago are sure to bring up the rear of the procession. The motion picture, we are happy to say, is very responsive to intelligent effort and good presentation will win the good will and patronage of desirable audiences. On the other hand, the motion pitcure does not lend itself and is not responsive to those tricks dear to the heart of the old-fashioned showman. The educational vein which runs through the motion picture, at times indistinguishable and at times strongly prominent, militates against antiquated methods of so-called showmanship. Intelligence and fair treatment of the audience are required of every successful man.

Strange as it may sound, exhibitors are frequently afraid of what is new and unconventional. Too many men in the exhibition branch of this industry waste their time in two ways: First in watching the success of their neighbor and second in trying to imitate it. It has happened time and again, to the writer's personal knowledge, that the manager of a large theater had the first opportunity to offer his patrons something new, but simply scorned the chance. He would make light of a proposed innovation and ignore valuable suggestions. A week or so later his neighbor, with a more original turn of mind, and eager for improvements, would run across some innovation or some suggestion, seize it, improve upon it and work it out skilfully. The response of the public was gratifyingly swift. Now, when the slower rival saw the success which the new departure had brought, he forgot his foolish scorn and immediately proceeded to give an imitation. Of course, it failed, as imitations always must fail. The old Latin proverb aptly says that "when two persons do the same thing it is not the same thing."

Universal Growing

President Carl Laemmle Talks of His Company's Big Plant at Fort Lee and of Universal City.

By George Blaisdell.

THERE are "goings on" at the offices of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company these days. Just before his departure for the Pacific Coast on the afternoon of November 5, President Carl Laemmle outlined a few of the projects his company has in contemplation as well as under way. First of all, Universal City, the objective of Mr. Laemmle's long trip, is rapidly being poured into shape—for all of the main buildings constituting that unique municipality are of concrete, reinforced. Then, again, there is the huge plant of the Universal at Leonia Heights, Fort Lee, N. J., which it is confidently predicted will be ready for the making of pictures by March or February of the coming year. As the Universal has centered all its western activities in one location—Universal City—so, too, it is preparing to combine in one comprehensive establishment the several scattered units that in the East have been contributing to the Universal sum.

While these indicated physical improvements were much in the thoughts of the Universal's president by no means did they absorb all of his attention. "Do you know the more I think of it the more am I impressed with the urgency of exhibitors getting from their patrons a fairer return for the entertainment they are providing?" said Mr. Laemmle. "We hear some talk about hard times, but you know and everybody in the business knows that there are not enough men and women out of work in any community to prevent an exhibitor from getting more money for his shows on Saturdays and Sundays. Exhibitors do not all take account of the fact that many who used to spend a lot of money on theatrical shows now go to the pictures almost exclusively.

"The only factor entering into the production of motion pictures that has not increased in cost is the single item of raw stock. Everything else has been going up, and then up. Why, we made a deal yesterday—and I'll admit that it sounds absurd, but it's a mighty cold fact—whereby we are to pay an average of twenty-five hundred dollars a week for one scenario a week for one year. That's a lot of money to put into a production, especially when you consider that it goes into a column of the books usually covered by comparatively small sums. We are not yet ready to reveal the identity of the writer who will furnish us with these stories—which will have to be put into script form afterward—but his stature in the literary world will surprise you. Now the pictures produced from these stories are going into our regular program. We have got to keep up with the procession, we have got to pay big sums for our scripts, and the man to pay us is the exchangeman. He must be reimbursed through the exhibitor, and the exhibitor ought to see that it is really for the benefit of his business, and that means for the benefit of his patrons, that these expenditures are incurred. We have just taken from a well-known writer six scenarios for which we are to pay $1,500. That may not be an amazing sum, but it's a whole lot more than has been paid in the past. So I say, as the cost of everything in the way of production is increasing, it seems only just that the exhibitor should raise his price of admission on Saturday and Sunday. Ninety million persons in the United States want better stuff, better workmanship, better quality, and I think exhibitors will find their people ready to pay for these things. We are selling no more film to the exchanges for 10 cents a foot. In spite of the increase we have been compelled to charge the exchange, our net profit has not been a bit more than it was, because we have been compelled to put the additional money into the pictures.

"In London our business is holding up wonderfully in spite of the fact that many are out of work and hundreds of thousands of men out of the country. On the Continent, of course, there is very little doing. If we could get negatives into Germany we could do business there. I want to reiterate, however, that with business conditions as they are in the United States it is ridiculous to say that exhibitors cannot charge and get 10 cents admission on Saturdays and Sundays at least. The public is demanding dollar entertainment at the picture houses, and it is unthinkable that it will not be willing to pay for what it is getting a sum sufficient to reimburse the manufacturer, the exchangeman and the exhibitor."

Mr. Laemmle reached across his desk and unrolled a number of blueprints. "I just want to show you what the Universal has under way in the East in the way of improvements. Here is the ground plan of our Fort Lee studio and laboratory. You will note that the plot is 300 by 600 feet." The plans, which have been executed by Edward Barnard Kinsila, provide for elaborate Italian gardens in the front of the plot, which faces the northeast. On one side is a pergola, with a pool in the center. At the left of the garden is an ornamental fountain. On the southeastern side of the plot for nearly half its length are two lakes, separated by a rustic bridge and waterfall. The studio and annex are situated just behind the Italian gardens. The studio is 151 by 80 feet. The annex is 80 by 142 by 130 by 151. At the rear of the plot is the laboratory, 145 by 65 feet. A large plaza separates the studios and the two-story laboratory. The structures are in the Tudor style of architecture, and attention has been given to the decorative as well as the utilitarian side. In the studios ten directors can work at one time. Provision has been made completely to shut off any portion of the studio, in case a producer is putting on a "noisy" scene, so that others will not be disturbed. The studios are believed to be the largest glass-inclosed buildings in the United States. The cost of the entire improvement is expected to approximate a quarter of a million dollars. "And out on the Pacific, in Universal City, in time to come, we expect to build a studio twice as large as this one," said President Laemmle.

The president of the Universal took down a bundle of photographs. His eyes sparkled. "I want you to see for yourself the evidence furnished by the camera as to what we are doing in Universal City," he said. The evidence was abundant, there being dozens of photographs. "Here is a city covering 260 acres devoted entirely to the purposes of picture making," said Mr. Laemmle. "It is situated twelve miles from Los Angeles and four miles from Hollywood, on the main highway from Los Angeles to San Francisco. Street cars from the former city pass the property, so that employees living in Los Angeles have excellent transportation facilities. We intend during the San Francisco Exposition next year to do considerable entertaining of friends who care to visit us while in the West. Uniformed guides will show them over the city. While the show in San Francisco is but a temporary exposition we are building a permanent one."

The photographs show the completed buildings of hollow tile and reinforced concrete construction. The white Administration Building, the laboratory and the projection room are three buildings that stand out. These front on Laemmle Boulevard, the thirteen-thousand-dollar highway which runs for a mile through the center of the town. Another striking picture is a general view of the great stage, showing the new diffusing system. Some of the others, and just some of them, are a panoramic view of the rear end of the city, with mountains in the background; the arena, 70 by 100, where animal pictures are taken; circular training cage, where the animals are accustomed to the camera; exterior and interior of saddlery storeroom, where are kept every kind of saddle known; dog kennels, animal property room, corral, vehicle repair shop, mill and sculpture department, carpenter shop, hay barn, pumping station, scene loft, recreation room in cavalry barracks, winter and summer quarters of Charley, largest elephant in captivity; long row of dressing rooms and shower baths, offices of Superintendent Wallace Kerrigan and Technical Director Lee Lawson, property room, exterior and interior of arsenal, wherein are stored hundreds of rifles and much ammunition; dormitory in cavalry barracks, horseshoeing and blacksmith shop, shelter for vehicles, showing a stage coach and Roman chariots; cages for wolves, coyotes, Eskimo dogs, lions, leopards and monkeys; restaurant, of hollow tile, 50 by 100 feet; stalls for English saddle horses and corral of Indian ponies; hospital, cavalry barracks, summer and winter quarters for dromedaries, cowboys' bunkhouse; one structure containing employment agency, extras' dressing rooms, water tank and engine room, costume department and tailor's shop, wardrobe storage—this latter building is two stories, 81 by 105 feet, of reinforced concrete. And there are others.

"On our eastern pictures we have had complaints about photography," said President Laemmle in concluding his talk. "When our Fort Lee plant is finished we intend to put into it all our eastern companies, and I think we will have no further photographic troubles. We are to spend $15,000 across the river just to get clear water. At different times we have been doing work at the plant in One Hundred and Tenth street, where the fire occurred; at Coytesville, at Forty-third street, in Eleventh avenue, and at Bayonne. We intend to retain the Bayonne factory, not removing even a printer, as an insurance against emergencies. Our Fort Lee establishment will contain an equipment that is brand new throughout. We will have facilities there for staging the most elaborate productions. We have abundant room to expand if at any time it be necessary. I think you will agree with me that when our east coast and west coast plants are in full working order, as they will be in a few months, the Universal will be in a position to give its customers and the public just what they want—that is, if we can learn what that is, and I think we can."

Kriterion to Release January First

Announcement Is Made as to the Identity of the Companies Contributing to It as Well as Some of Its Plans.

DEFINITE announcement has been made as to the inauguration of the Kriterion program and of the companies that will contribute to it. The first release will be on Friday, January 1. The brands will be Paragon, Thistle, Navahoe, Monarch, Alhambra, Robin, Santa Barbara and Kriterion Star. Of the twenty-one reels in the program, six will be single length and six will be two-part. Six subjects will be comedies. Already signed up are twenty-four exchanges in the United States and two in Canada. It has been the aim of the management to give exhibitors quick service. With this in view, jurisdiction has been given not according to state lines, but rather in accordance with proximity to exchange points.

The Crown City Film Manufacturing Company will produce the Thistle and Paragon brands. One will be a comedy and the other a drama. The directors are Donald MacDonald and Bruce Mitchell. Arthur H. Coldoway is studio manager. In the comedies will be Rena Rogers, Ralph McComas and Allen Frallick, and in the dramas, as leading woman, Dorothy Davenport and as leading man Joe Singleton. Ed Alexander is also a member of this company.

The Navahoe Film Manufacturing Company will have at the head of its producing forces Charles K. French. Mr. French has had wide experience in directing western stuff, having been one of the original Bison men, and he has also been with other companies featuring western life. While the manager is not yet ready to announce the name of the leading man of this company, it can be said, if it prove to be the same person intimated to the World man, there is no better screen actor.

The Monarch Producing Company will have as managing director Harry Harvey, who has had experience with, among other companies, Solax, Nestor, Broncho and Frontier.

The Alhambra Film Manufacturing Company, which will produce comedies and dramas, will, it is promised, be under the direction of one of the best known screen players, who has been featured in a wide range of subjects, including western and straight dramas.

Robin's Photoplays, Inc., will have at its head as general manager and director Jesse Robin. Some of Mr. Robin's more recent work has been released through the Eclectic offices. At the head of this company will be J. L. Phillips and Miss Gertrude Ruby. This organization will specialize in comedy-drama.

The Santa Barbara Company will make two brands, a drama and a comedy. At the head of the dramatic forces will be William Robert Daly, who will direct a strong company supporting Miss Fritzi Brunette. Mr. Daly is a well-known director, having for a long time been with the Imp company. His most recent work has been the production of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and "Jack o' Diamonds," of five and six reels respectively, and both successful. Bert Angeles, one time Vitagraph director, will be at the head of the comedy department. As leading woman will be Reta Williams. The leading man is not yet announced.

As to the Kriterion Star productions, the company says it will in due course have a most interesting communication to make, declining for strategic reasons to uncover its hand at present.

Aubrey M. Kennedy, the general manager of the Santa Barbara Company, will have complete authority over the products of the western organizations. About December 1 the company will move into its executive offices on the sixth floor of the Mecca Building, using a part of the quarters formerly occupied by the Kinemacolor Company, among which will be the excellent projection room. All laboratory work will be done in the East. The company has secured a large and finely equipped studio and factory in the metropolitan district. While each producing company will have its own scenario department, the parent organization will have co-operative jurisdiction over scripts and all matters pertaining to each company.

The statement is made by an official of the new concern that there are ample funds to carry out all the plans now under way or in contemplation.

On December 5, a man well known in the trade will assume charge of the publicity department. In control of the department assigning release dates, will be a man now associated with one of the old-line companies. It is promised that announcements of interest to the trade will be made from time to time.

Mutual to Centralize Advertising.

Majority of Companies Contributing to Its Program Will Issue Publicity Matter Through One Bureau.

AN important bit of news for this week is the affiliation of a majority of the allied producers on the Mutual program in the matter of publicity. Keystone, Reliance, Majestic, Kay-Bee, American, Beauty, Domino, Broncho and Mutual Weekly will concentrate their advertising and handle it from the offices of the Mutual rather than as independent manufacturers, as has been the case heretofore. A department has been organized, under the direction of John W. Grey, formerly of the Universal, which will attend to these matters.

In the future there will be a "death watch" on all productions of the Mutual. In other words, representative judges have been selected who will pass upon the products of the various manufacturers. Any feature or film released by the Mutual must pass at least 60 per cent. in the various branches of the moving picture art. This includes direction, photography, action, story, dramatic values and continuity. If a film shown to this body does not come up to the proper standard it will not be released.

"I have decided upon this move primarily because I am of the opinion that the moving picture industry has passed the stage of swaddling clothes," said H. E. Aitken, president of the Mutual. "We have arrived at a point where 'quality' is the most important item in the manufacture of film. I have always striven to make the Mutual and its releases the most perfect, from the standpoint of photography and picture art. With this in mind, I have decided that in order successfully to give the exhibitor a program which will be equal, if not superior, to the present so-called features, a jury of competent judges is the only way to aid the exhibitor and successfully carry out my ideas."

Speaking of the new policy of the Mutual in regard to releasing its special features on a states' right basis, Mr. Aitken said:

"I have always felt that such features as D. W. Griffith has produced are far too beautiful and wonderful to attempt to handle and to do justice to by so large an organization as I am associated with. I have decided the only way really to do justice to pictures of this calibre is to sell the rights to reputable state rights people, who will exploit them in a manner befitting their importance.

"A feature such as 'The Avenging Conscience,' for instance, would never receive the proper attention if it were exploited in the regular way, and such pictures as this, which is one of Mr. Griffith's masterpieces, are deserving of a better fate than is commonly imposed upon the regular feature, released in the regular way.

"There have been so many state rights' propositions on the market that have hardly come up to the average of regular program material released by the large manufacturers that it is about time proper attention be devoted to this most important part of the industry. If more attention were paid to the end of purchasing proper and lasting subjects, the present position of the states rights' branch of the business would not be looked down upon as it is now."

NEW DETROIT FEATURE FILM COMPANIES.

Detroit is headquarters for the All-Red Feature Company and the British-American Feature Company, which concerns have been recently organized. The All-Red company is specializing in features and is also getting out a war weekly; its efforts are confined only to Canada. The weekly is booked for months ahead. The company will bring out its first feature release about November 15; the picture will be "War Pigeon." It is an historical subject in three reels. The scenario was written by Arthur Stringer, who is now at work on several other scenarios. The war weekly contains 800 feet. The officers of the All-Red Feature Company are F. H. Lawrence, of Detroit, general manager; W. H. Lawrence, of Detroit, treasurer, and R. T. Coe, of Windsor, president. The company has its American offices at 1613 Dime Bank building, and has its studio and plant at Windsor, which is in Canada, across the river.

The British American Feature Company was organized for the purpose of handling the American and foreign rights to all of the pictures produced by the All-Red company. Its offices for the present will be at 1613 Dime Bank building. The firm comprises W. C. Skerrett and Victor J. Lorden. The All-Red company, by the way, in addition to the regular war weekly plan to produce a feature about every three weeks.

"The Ordeal" in Court

Justice Davis Hears Argument on Application for Order to Restrain the Commissioner of Licenses from Interference with the Picture.

ARGUMENT on the application for an order to restrain the Commissioner of Licenses from interfering with the exhibition of the picture "The Ordeal" at Hammerstein's Lexington Avenue Opera House was heard Wednesday, November 11th, before Justice Vernon M. Davis, sitting at Special Term in the Supreme Court. The plaintiff, i.e., The Life Photo Play Company, was represented by Gustavus A. Rogers, of Rogers Brothers, while Commissioner Bell was represented by George P. Nickolson of the Corporation Counsel's Office.

Mr. Rogers contended that Commissioner Bell had attempted to set himself up as a censor of motion pictures for which he had no warrant in law. He described the picture as a dream based upon a poem which had nothing objectionable in it. He told the Court that there was no violation of the spirit of neutrality anywhere in the picture.

"Are armies shown in uniform," asked Judge Davis, "clearly indicating that they were respectively French and German?"

Mr. Rogers admitted that such was the case. He said he was afraid that the Commissioner would take away the license of the Lexington Opera House if his client insisted on showing the picture after being requested to discontinue its exhibition, hence his application for a restraining order.

In opposition Mr. Nickolson cited the affidavits of a large number of members of the National Board of Censors to whom he referred as "public spirited citizens giving their time without pay." He said that after the exhibition of the pictures the telephone in the Commissioner's office was kept ringing with protests. Objections had also been registered in the Mayor's office. The picture, Mr. Nickolson said, was described by these protestants as violently anti-German and liable to cause a riot whenever shown.

"What these people want," said the representative of the Corporation Counsel, "is to have this court set its approval on this film and then take advantage of it in the advertising of the film. They tried the same maneuvre in Washington, where the Secretary of State expressly denied that any such approval had ever been given, though asked for." Mr. Nickolson read from affidavits of prominent exhibitors, among them S. L. Rothapfel, of The Strand, condemning the picture as likely to cause a breach of the peace wherever shown.

At this point Judge Davis, who took a keen interest in the argument, interrupted the lawyer to ask just what the Commissioner of Licenses had done or had threatened to do in the premises. Mr. Nickolson read from the affidavit of Commissioner Bell, showing that Mr. Bell had never gone beyond making a request for the discontinuance of the exhibition of the film. Judge Davis doubted whether under such circumstances there was anything for him to do, but Attorney Rogers claimed that the deputy commissioner had made a threat of a revocation of license.

"It is not the practice of this Court," said Judge Davis, "to interfere with the discretion of any public official, provided such discretion has some foundation in reason and common sense. This Court does not issue licenses. That function has by plain enactment been conferred upon the Commissioner of Licenses. The Commissioner may not have the right to say in advance what picture he will allow to be shown and what pictures he will prohibit, but as a general proposition of law this Court will not disturb the discretionary finding of an official where there is some ground for the exercise of sound discretion."

Both sides asked leave to submit further documents and affidavits which was granted. The Justice indicated that he will render an early decision.

A CHANCE FOR "NORTH-AMERICAN" PRODUCERS.

The demand for American films is evidently growing, the war having practically ended all manufacturing in the principal European countries. The Moving Picture World is in receipt of a letter from Senor Masjuan-Cuadrada, of Avino 18, in the city of Barcelona, Spain, which seems to confirm the dearth of films abroad. Senor Masjuan-Cuadrada is looking for a chance to represent American producing firms in Spain and Portugal. He says that Spain looks to "North-American producers" to get its needed supply of motion picture films.

More Animal Pictures

David Horsley Buys Bostock's Wild Animal Show, the Biggest on Earth.

BY one of the largest deals of its sort ever recorded in the motion picture business Frank C. Bostock's unequalled collection of trained wild animals is coming back to America to appear in motion pictures for David Horsley. The animals are due to arrive November 18 on the Atlantic Transport liner "Minnewaska." While the exact purchase price is not known it may be definitely stated to be in excess of $100,000.

The European war is directly responsible for Mr. Horsley being able to secure this collection of trained animals. When Frank C. Bostock, the animal king died, the animals passed to Mrs. Bostock. They were quartered in London and, a few weeks ago, Mrs. Bostock sent Harry E. Tudor, personal representative of Mr. Bostock for twelve years, to America to dispose of the animals. Mr. Horsley outbid all other purchasers.

The collection, comparing in size with the Hagenbeck collection which has been confiscated by the German government, contains trained wild animals of every imaginable kind. There are twenty-eight lions, fourteen leopards, fifteen polar bears, twelve pumas, six elephants, three camels, five tigers, several chimpanzees and a monkey cage. Many of the animals possess special qualifications such as the skating bears, dancing bears, boxing kangaroos, and wrestling bears. Among the most interesting animals in the collection are three baby lions. All the principal trainers and handlers will enroll under the Horsley banner. Bostock's animal players will be seen in motion pictures made by Mr. Horsley. The pictures, which will be special releases, will comprise single reel pictures, a motion picture serial and feature pictures.

Frank C. Bostock, the animal king, was known all over the world. His marvelous collection of animals has been recognized as the greatest on earth for many years. America, England, Canada and Australia, in short all English speaking countries, recognized Mr. Bostock as one of the foremost figures of the amusement world. On his death the New York newspapers and publications all over the country devoted columns of space to the exciting and adventurous career of the wild animal king.

By the terms of sale Mr. Horsley acquires sole rights to the Bostock name as well as the animals. The name, in itself, is a most valuable asset.

On arriving in New York the animals will be re-shipped to Los Angeles accompanied by Mr. Tudor and the trainers and handlers. In Los Angeles the animals will be installed in new, large and pretentious quarters now being erected on the grounds occupied by Mr. Horsley's studios where the producing forces of the new Mina comedies will also be located for the winter.

FAVORITE PLAYERS' STUDIOS BUSY.

The Favorite Players, of which Carlyle Blackwell is the head, has taken over the entire stage of the Norbig Studios, Los Angeles, which will be used in addition to their own studios for their forthcoming releases on the Alliance program.

Both studios are alive with activity preparing the settings for Mr. Blackwell's production of "The Last Chapter," by Richard Harding Davis. For the staging of this picture a Zulu village is being constructed on the Glendale Road, and nearby the temporary quarters for the camels, oxen, elephants and reptiles to be used in this production is rapidly nearing completion. This is the second Davis story done into film by Mr. Blackwell and will be followed by "The High Hand," a political romance from the pen of Jacques Futrelle.

THE STRAND TO HELP BELGIAN RELIEF.

Under the auspices of L. de Sadeleer, Minister of State for Belgium; Emanuel Havenith, Belgian Minister to the United States; Pierre Mali, Belgian Consul General in New York; the Belgian Relief Committee, and with the co-operation of the Committee of Mercy, a performance will be given at the Strand Theater on the afternoon of Tuesday, December 8. The theater has been donated and many prominent members of the theatrical profession have volunteered to contribute their services in a unique and all-star performance. There will be no incidental expenses whatever, so that the entire proceeds from the sale of tickets will be turned over to the Belgian Relief Fund. Mrs. August Belmont is the chairman of the committee on arrangements.

Film Rights Go To Play Owner

Appellate Division So Decides in the Suit of Charles Frohman Against the Father of Clyde Fitch.

IN the suit filed by Charles Frohman against William G. Fitch, father of Clyde Fitch, the playwright, and the American Play Company, the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, to which was submitted the controversy, found that the right of the theatrical manager was supreme in the ownership of the play "Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines" and it enjoined the American Play Company from producing it in moving pictures. The suit was of considerable importance, as in it was the question as to the rights of authors to the moving picture rights of their productions where contracts were made prior to the advent of the motion picture.

Justice Chester B. McLaughlin wrote the prevailing opinion of the court, and his opinion was concurred in by Justices George L. Ingraham, presiding, Frank C. Laughlin, John Proctor Clarke and Francis M. Scott. There was no dissent.

The following is the opinion in full:

The plaintiff is, and on the 15th of February, 1900, was, the manager of certain theaters in the City of New York and elsewhere, and a large producer of plays throughout the United States. On the day named he employed one Clyde Fitch, a reputable writer of plays, to write a play for him, and the same was to be delivered on or before the 1st of January following. The agreement between them was in part as follows: "Whereas the said party of the first part agrees to write and deliver a play on or before January 1, 1901, and whereas the said party of the second part desires the exclusive right to produce or to have produced the said play in the United States of America and in Canada, now, therefore, * * * the said party of the first part agrees to sell, assign and transfer, and hereby does sell, assign and transfer to the said party of the second part, the exclusive right to produce the said play in the United States of America and in Canada, for which sale, assignment and transfer the said party of the second part agrees to pay to the said party of the first part or to his authorized agent as follows:" Then follow provisions for the payment of $500 on the execution of the agreement, and, if the play were accepted, a further sum of $500, both payments in advance of the authorized royalties—the royalties thereafter accruing to depend upon the receipts. There was also a provision in the contract to the effect that if the play were produced it was to be in a first-class theater and in a first-class manner.

Fitch wrote the play, gave it the name of "Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines," and delivered it to the plaintiff, and the same was accepted within the time specified in the contract. It was produced with success by leading actresses in the principal cities of the United States, and was a valuable theatrical production. The contract, some three years after its date, was modified by permitting the plaintiff to lease the play to stock companies, and providing that the receipts received from such leasing should be at the rate of 50 per cent. to each of the parties to the contract.

When the play was originally produced it was only in first-class theaters, in which the price for orchestra seats was $2 in large cities and $1.50 in other cities, the price for other parts of the theaters being relatively smaller, but when the play was performed in so-called stock theaters—that is, theaters run by stock companies—the prices varied from $1 to 15 cents, according to the city, theater and location of seats.

Clyde Fitch died on September 4, 1909, and all his property, including his rights under the contract referred to, passed to his father, the defendant, William G. Fitch. In March, 1914, William G. Fitch entered into contract with the defendant American Play Company, by which he assumed to grant to it the right to produce the play throughout the United States and Canada by means of moving pictures, and the Play Company has publicly announced that it intends to produce the play in that way.

According to the agreed statement of facts, the Play Company knew of the original and subsequent contracts between Clyde Fitch and the plaintiff when it entered into the contract with William G. Fitch. The defendant's counsel conceded, upon the argument of the question presented, that a moving picture presentation of the play in the manner contemplated by the Play Company would constitute the production of a play, but contends that the right to such a production was reserved to Clyde Fitch and, upon his death, passed to William G. Fitch. This contention is based upon the argument that at the time the contract was entered into neither of the parties contemplated production of the play by means of moving pictures. Even though it be conceded that neither of the parties had in mind the production of the play in that manner, nevertheless, I think it is a clear violation of the contract to permit the play to be so produced. The contract, as we have seen, gave to the plaintiff the "exclusive right to produce or to have produced the said play in the United States of America and in Canada." This exclusive right was to protect the plaintiff in the property which he had purchased. That the plaintiff's rights under the contract constituted property cannot be questioned. That by the aid of science it has, since the contract was executed, been made possible to produce the play in some manner not then contemplated, does not give William G. Fitch nor the American Play Company the right to destroy plaintiff's property or diminish the value of what he purchased. The fact that the plaintiff agreed to produce the play only in first-class theaters and in a first-class manner does not contemplate that the author of the play reserved to himself the right to produce it in a second-class theater in a second-class manner. On the contrary, this provision was inserted in the contract to protect the author of the play by insuring to him that his production should only be produced in a credible place and in such a way as would add to his reputation.

If the foregoing view be correct, then the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment enjoining and restraining the defendants from producing the play in the manner contemplated, with costs.

All concur.

GEORGE MELFORD WITH LASKY.

Word comes from the coast that George Melford, long-time director and photoplayer connected with the Kalem Company, has joined the directing staff of the Lasky company at Los Angeles. A story to the effect that he had joined Carlyle Blackwell's company, printed in a theatrical journal, is erroneous.

Screen Club's Ball Thanksgiving Eve.

Arrangements for the Annual Function, Which Will Be Held at the Hotel Astor, Being Rapidly Completed.

THE arrangements for the third annual ball of the Screen Club are well under way. The time is Thanksgiving Eve, Wednesday, November 25, and the place is the Gold Room of the Hotel Astor. The price of the tickets has been placed at $5, which will admit a couple. Already there has been a lively demand for invitations. Jule Burnstein, who has in charge the sale of boxes, reports that many have been disposed of. There are thirty-six of these on the lower tier and twenty-four on the upper. Mr. Burnstein may be reached at the clubhouse or at his business address, at the Eclectic offices, 115 East Twenty-third street. Tickets of admission may be obtained from members or at the clubrooms, 165 West Forty-seventh street.

President Kirkwood has named a representative committee to co-operate with the Board of Governors in making this affair a big success, especially from a social viewpoint. Aside from the screen players—and nearly all of the Eastern actors and actresses are now in the city—there will be a generous representation of stage men and women, some of whom have been seen on the screen and some who have not. Former President Baggot will entertain as his guest Donald Brian, now starring at the Knickerbocker theater in "The Girl from Utah." If Mr. Brian should join the dancers on the floor—and it is inconceivable that he should be content to remain in the category of a "wallflower"—there will be shown some graceful steps worth going a distance to see.

First Vice-President Ben Wilson has arranged for the Hotel Astor's orchestra and great organ, the pipes of which are placed about the ballroom. The music will be one of the features. While nothing is being said about souvenirs there is reason to believe that these will not be overlooked. An effort will be made to have the grand march eclipse that of the first annual ball, which in filmdom is still remembered. In charge of the lighting will be Will C. Smith of the Nicholas Power Company—and what Mr. Smith knows about light effects is a lot. He may be depended on to do something not only original but effectively picturesque.

It will be a big night, that Thanksgiving Eve, and those who may be anxious for an opportunity to renew old friendships and associations will find their old friends and old associates waiting to be looked up.

Pauline Frederick in "Zaza"

DIRECTLY following the important announcements that the Famous Players Film Co. has secured two such celebrated dramatic successes as "David Harum" and "The Old Homestead," comes word from that company that it has now obtained the film rights to the great emotional drama, "Zaza." This stage triumph was the starring vehicle of the noted French actress, Mme. Rejane, and our own American stage celebrity, Mrs. Leslie Carter.

Pauline Frederick.

"Zaza" will undoubtedly make an unusually powerful photo-drama, with its deep heart interest and tense human appeal. In the film version of this play, the Famous Players will star Pauline Frederick, who has won unusual distinction in the current success, "Innocent," and who has already completed engagements in two forthcoming Famous Players productions, "S ld," and "The Eternal City," the first of which will be released during the next two months. As contained in a recent announcement, Miss Frederick is under exclusive contract with the Famous Players Film Co. for a series of film characterizations.

This production will be the first release of the Famous Players Film Co. in affiliation with Charles Frohman.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

SOUTHWESTERN EXPOSITION GREAT SUCCESS.

Exhibitors and Supply Men Hold Meeting at Dallas and Have Big Representation—Exhibitors Elect Officers.

THE Southwestern Motion Picture Exposition, held in Dallas, Texas, October 25, 26 and 27, was a grand success from all angles. A large two-story building in the downtown district was equipped for the Exposition, the downstairs floor being divided into booths, and the upstairs floor used for an auditorium. The exhibit booths were decorated in many colors, as was the exterior of the building; and practically every film exchange and supply concern in the Southwest was represented.

Those having exhibit booths were: Eclectic, Apex, Lewis System, Box Office, Cremona Musical Instruments, Southern Film, Thrash Film, Sanozone, Violano-Virtuoso Musical Instruments, Southern Theater News, Southwestern Picture Inspection Bureau, Dallas Film, Sawyer, Consolidated Film, Big Four Feature, American Seating, Dallas Scenic, Blinkhorn Film, Alco, Wurlitzer Musical Instruments, Paramount Film, United Theater Chair, Photo Drama, Warner's, World Film, Atlas Metal Works, and others. In the auditorium, screens were stretched and machines installed, and during the day and evening, feature films were shown.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Texas Branch, No. 18, met during the last two days, and as invited guests, many members of Oklahoma, Louisiana and Arkansas Branches were in attendance at these meetings. Exhibitors were admitted to the building free, their badges acting as passes, but outsiders were charged a nominal sum for admission. It is estimated that five thousand "fans" visited the exposition building daily.

The opening day (Sunday), was spent in registering the visiting exhibitors and providing them with badges, and very little outside entertainment was endeavored. On the morning of the second day, at 10 A. M., the M. P. E. L. met in the auditorium, and also met again at 2 P. M., and at the same hours on the third day. Monday noon, about five hundred feet of motion pictures was taken of the exhibitors and supply men in and around the exposition building, by Cameraman Fitzhugh. This reel was finished up with scenes at the State Fair Grounds and local views and will be booked over the State.

Monday afternoon the League elected the following officers to serve for one year: T. P. Finnegan, Dallas, president; John Davis, Houston, first vice-president; G. K. Jorgenson, Galveston, second vice-president; J. C. Clemmons, Beaumont, secretary, and Ed Beserer, Austin, treasurer. A Grievance Committee was appointed consisting of members Ridout, Xydias, Besserer, Campbell and Finnegan.

At 8 P. M. Tuesday night the exhibitors and supply men and their ladies were guests at the banquet and entertainment at the Oriental Hotel. A hundred and twenty-five plates were laid. After the banquet, short talks were made by T. P. Finnegan, of Dallas; E. H. Hulsey, of Houston; G. K. Jorgenson, of Galveston; B. H. Powell, of Oklahoma City; Ned E. Depinet and others.

After the short talks, the guests formed their chairs in a circle around a temporary stage, where a four-act vaudevile was arranged by James B. Kelly of the entertainment committee. Louis St. Pierre, of the Dallas Scenic Studio, was first on the program, with a clever magic stunt, winding up his act with a rapid artistic water color sketch. Mrs. Marguerite DeOrto was next presented, and entertained the guests with some beautifully rendered songs of the day. Joe Gilligan, of the Blinkhorn office, then occupied the stage, and told some very laughable Irish jokes. He also gave a good reading of John Hayes "Jim Bludsoe." The last act was a burlesque "Mind Reading" act, presented by Tomes and Walker, of the Southern Theater News. When Walker, who played the part of the "Mind Reader," said that Arthur Geis (7 foot 4 inches tall), nationality was "Pole," the "act" was nearly broken up by laughter. After the vaudeville, the banqueters enjoyed dancing until a late hour, and when the gathering was finally broken up, everyone left with that smile of happy enjoyment.

"The Lure," a picture prohibited by the Dallas censor, was shown in the Auditorium of the exposition building Monday night, being run exclusively for the motion picture exhibitors; but as admission was charged to outsiders at the entrance of the building, there was some newspaper "talk" of complications. A short inquiry was made by the Municipal authorities, but on account of a statement being made before the picture was shown, that it was strictly for the exhibitors, no action was taken by the City.

One of the novelties of the exposition was the miniature motion picture theater installed in the Sawyer booth, where a continuous show was run. Another of the features was the "Daily Extra" of the Southern Theater News, which was published each morning during the exposition, giving news of the previous day's happenings.

A total of 341 exhibitors registered at the registration office during the three days, and it is estimated that at least a hundred exhibitors visited the exposition building after the registration office was closed in the afternoon.

The exposition was a success from every angle, and it is planned to hold such a meeting in Dallas each fall.

J. S. PHILLIPS.

EXHIBITORS JOIN UNITED MANAGERS.

Arthur J. O'Keeffe, of the United Managers' Protective Association, Makes Flying Trip Through New York State.

TO LEARN through direct contact with motion picture exhibitors just what might be the feeling in regard to organization Arthur J. O'Keeffe, of the United Managers' Protective Association, last week took a trip through New York State. Mr. O'Keeffe is the associate of Ligon Johnson, general counsel of the organization. He has had wide experience in organizing and in handling large bodies of men. For ten years he was in the municipal service of New York City. He was on the Civil Service Commission, for two years he was First Deputy Police Commissioner under Mr. Bingham, he was for two years First Deputy Fire Commissioner under Commissioner Waldo, and later he was Bridge Commissioner under Mayor Gaynor. While in the Police and Fire Departments he maintained toward amusement interests an attitude based on common sense interpretation of the code. If violations were filed against a theater or a motion picture house Mr. O'Keeffe would see to it that the owner or lessee was given sufficient time to make his changes, provided, always, of course, there was evident intention on the part of the proprietor to do what the law called for.

Mr. O'Keeffe visited on his trip Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, Utica, Schenectady and Albany. The immediate occasion of the journey was a telegram from Rochester picture men asking for advice and assistance in a dispute they were having with their operators. The Rochester local has a membership of forty-five, of whom twenty were present at the meeting called by Mr. Minder. Following a statement by Mr. O'Keeffe of the objects and aims of the United Managers and their method of doing business all the exhibitors present signified their intention of joining the association and of using their influence with the other exhibitors in the city to do likewise.

In Buffalo Mr. O'Keeffe visited a number of the prominent exhibitors, was cordially received, and given substantial encouragement. In Syracuse twenty exhibitors met at the Onondaga Hotel in response to a call sent out. All promised to sign applications for membership in the association. Mr. O'Keeffe was told that in Syracuse there was urgent need of organization, the exhibitors being convinced that there were altogether too many five-cent houses and that this condition primarily was due to lack of cohesion among the men in the business.

F. S. Anderson, president of the unaffiliated local in Utica, called a meeting of exhibitors of the city. The picture men were very strong for the United Managers and there were many requests for application blanks. In Schenectady Mr. O'Keeffe heard complaints that business was very poor and that the exhibitors were anxious to take steps tending to strengthen their interests. In Albany Mr. O'Keeffe was given close attention and much encouragement. Among the exhibitors most enthusiastic for the new organization of amusement men was Edward M. Hart, of Harmanus Bleecker Hall, who is taking active interest. Mr. O'Keeffe said that as the result of his trip, undertaken in the nature of a "flyer," he is convinced that among the motion picture exhibitors there is a wide field for work by the United Managers' Protective Association.

PITTSBURGH EXHIBITORS HOLD MASS MEETING.

The mass meeting of exhibitors, which was held Sunday, October 25, in the Olympic Theater, Pittsburgh, Pa., did not turn out to be very massive in proportions, but a fair-sized crowd of exhibitors and exchange men attended. It made up in enthusiasm what it lacked in size. Plans were laid for a line of action which, it is thought, will awaken the exhibitors from their indifferent attitude towards organization. H. C. Kliehm officiated in the capacity of chairman and A. J. Hanna was secretary.

R. W. Swett, a representative of the Nicholas Power Company, who is a member of the Exhibitors' League of Masachusetts, told how his organization fought adverse legislation. Harvey B. Day gave an instructive talk on organization and co-operation among exhibitors and exchangemen. Sydney Abel spoke in favor of social features and thought they should be held once a month. Max Herring suggested that some form of entertainment be devised as an incentive to attending and A. Dresner coincided. These two men were then appointed a committee to arrange a social affair to be held Sunday, November 8, in the Olympic Theater.

CIRCUMVENTS TAX BY REMOVING SEATS.

While the war tax on motion picture houses has not been welcomed by any means by Cincinnati exhibitors, their friends across the river, in Newport and Covington, Ky., who usually feel that they are almost a part of the Queen City, are really hit much harder, and have loudly announced that fact. This is by reason of the Kentucky state license tax, Kentucky and West Virginia, by the way, being the only states imposing such a tax. It is estimated that the war tax on Covington exhibitors will net the Government nearly $700, figured on a seating capacity of 7,000 for the fifteen theaters of the size taxed. However, it is understood that several exhibitors, determined to escape, if possible, the triple tax of city, state and Federal governments, will remove enough seats to place them in a lower class, preferring to lose revenue rather than pay the tax.

NEGROES REFUSE TO OBEY HOUSE RULES.

Manager Everett S. Wheeler of the Colonial Theater at Urbana, Ill., met with what looked like an organized attempt to thwart his plan of having a Jim Crow section in his moving picture house. When W. J. Prince and his wife, negroes, entered the Colonial they were ushered to the section allotted to blacks. Later they arose and took seats in the section reserved for whites. Attaches of the house called the negroes' attention to the fact that they were out of place and that the tickets purchased stated "Subject to conditions." Prince loudly protested, and said none but a policeman could remove him from the house. He courted arrest and intimated that he wanted to test the ruling. A policeman refused to give him grounds for false imprisonment, but told him to appear in court the next morning. The judge the next day said the policeman had done his duty in removing the negroes from the theater.

PENNSYLVANIA LEAGUE MEETING NOVEMBER 18.

At the request of the majority of members of the executive committee of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, a meeting of the board has been called for Harrisburg, Wednesday, November 18, at the Commonwealth Hotel. A committee from the western association will meet the exhibitors from the East. The gathering will include the following: President Sam F. Wheeler, Philadelphia; National Vice-President Gilbert C. Miller, Plymouth; 1st Vice-President Ben. H. Zerr, Reading; 2nd Vice-President Francis E. Devlin, Wilkes-Barre; Secretary J. G. Hansen, Reading; Treasurer E. F. McAtee, Mahanoy City; Publicity Representative Frank A. Gould, Reading.

PITTSBURGH EXHIBITORS MEET.

The regular semi-monthly meeting of the Pittsburgh Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association was held at the headquarters, 113 Fourth avenue, November 2. Two new members were received at this meeting, making a total of fourteen applications during the month of October. The present quarters were found to be not large enough, and the trustees were authorized to secure larger quarters.

The committee of the exhibitors' convention reported rapid progress on the coming convention to be held at Harrisburg, and indications are that a very large crowd will attend, as both exhibitors and supply houses are very enthusiastic, and have promised their support to make it a success, at least from the Western Pennsylvania district.

WORKING ON PITTSBURGH SCREEN CLUB.

The project originally planned by Messrs. Max Herring and A. Dresner, of Pittsburgh, Pa., to have a gathering of some sort to get the exchangemen and exhibitors in that city together has been called off and what will doubtless be the most elaborate affair of the kind ever held by Pittsburgh film men and exhibitors has evolved from the proposed "Dutch lunch or gathering of some kind," by these two men.

At first it was the intention to have a small gathering, but after talking it over with the exchangemen it was decided to collect funds and conduct a banquet which should prove a fitting event which will likely result in a Pittsburgh Screen Club, a social organization composed of men from every department of the motion picture industry.

The plans are to hold a banquet in the Fort Pitt Hotel on Sunday, November 15, at 3 p.m., to which every exchangeman and exhibitor is invited. Joseph G. Armstrong, mayor of Pittsburgh, will likely be present and make an address; also Rabbi J. Leonard Levy. An elaborate menu will be prepared.

Publications Relating to Motion Pictures Score in Twelve Out of Fourteen Weeks in Public Libraries.

IT IS evidence of the widespread interest in motion pictures that almost every week at least one book dealing with the subject is listed by the New York Public Library in his list of books, other than fiction, most in demand for the current week. This list is regarded by those interested as the standard throughout the country. From The Bookman the following table is prepared for the three months ending with September, the latest for which reliable data is available. It will be noticed that the publications of the Moving Picture World are in the lead. The number in parenthesis indicates the place of the work in the list:

August 5. (1) Writing the Photoplay—Leeds-Esenwein. August 12. (2) Technique of the Photoplay—Sargent. August 19. (1) Handbook—Richardson. August 26. (3) Technique of the Photoplay—Sargent.

July 1. (6) Technique of the Photoplay—Sargent. July 8. (3) Handbook—Richardson. July 15. None. July 22. None. July 28. (8) Handbook—Richardson.

September 2. (3) Moving Pictures—Talbot. September 9. (2) Writing the Photoplay—Leeds-Esenwein. September 16. (2) Technique of the Photoplay—Sargent. September 23. (2) Handbook—Richardson. September 30. (5) Technique of the Photoplay—Sargent.

In fourteen weeks but two show no work on photoplay. More than 30 per cent. of the titles listed relate to the war, but the only book to lead the list twice and show second twice was the Castles' "Modern Dancing." This and Sargent's "Technique" are the only books not dealing with the war to be listed four times in the three months, and photoplay writing leads with seven mentions, of which five are the Sargent book. "Technique of the Photoplay" is the only book (including war titles), listed five times in the fourteen schedules. Mr. Richardson shares with the Castles and Kirkpatrick's "War—What For?" second place with four mentions, and Richardson and Sargent alone are mentioned in each of the three months. This is a record to be proud of, considering that these two books have been published for more than a year, while most of the books listed as most in demand are of comparatively recent issue.

CHILDREN'S PICTURE ENTERTAINMENTS

The shows for school children recently inaugurated at the Mary Anderson Theater, Louisville, Ky., under the auspices of the Parent-Teacher League, of Louisville, are being well attended on Saturday mornings and are proving successful. The women of the censorship committee, formed to pass upon the films shown at the theater, recently met at the Louisville Free Public Library, where it was decided that the films would be censored every Friday afternoon at 5 o'clock. A long list of films which may be procured upon request was read by the chairman of the committee, and a number of the members signified a desire to have Christmas, historical and nature pictures sent on for approval, as well as one depicting the world's series of baseball games.

"Julius Caesar"

Powerful, Spectacular and Impressive Production Upon the Story of the Great Conqueror.—A Kleine Six-Part Release.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

"JULIUS CAESAR" may safely be added to the brilliant array of high-class productions which strengthen the hold of the motion picture upon general popular favor. Rome and her story are inexhaustibly rich in materials for spectacular displays and whenever these materials are worked out within a suitable dramatic frame-work the results are sure to be gratifying.

The real theme of this version of Julius Caesar is the biography of the great conqueror. All the dramatic and spectacular features, in which the life of Caesar abounds are skillfully developed. The settings, a very important item in a production of this sort are beyond all praise and will stand comparison with the very best the screen has ever shown. Not the least charm of these settings consists of their variety. So rich is this production in powerful spectacular scenes that only a few can be mentioned here. To try and describe even a little more would mean the use of many pages. The mighty senate of Rome, always first in the immortal S. P. Q. R., has been visualized in the most impressive manner. One does not have to be a classic student to absorb and appreciate such a spectacle. The dignity and the power of the greatest nation in the world's history are visibly present in these scenes. The massing of the war-like forces at sea, the fierce struggles in the country of the Gauls, the conquest of the great leader, Vercingetorix, the scenes in and about the Capitol of Rome specially constructed for the occasion, the triumphal entry of Caesar, the crossing of the Rubicon, the final scene "at the base of Pompey's statue," are but a very few of the magnificent spectacles in which this production abounds.

The thread of the story has been dexterously woven, the intent evidently being to emphasize the human heart-interest. This latter grows with the progress of events. The picture gathers great force in the latter part and is strongest at the finish. Nowhere could I detect the slightest trace of padding; the dramatic and spectacular are joined with a powerful effect; the delight of the eye and the interest in the story combine to make the feature a most pleasing entertainment.

The part of Julius Caesar is taken by Anthony Novelli, whose rendition of the Roman patrician in "Quo Vadis" will long be remembered with admiration. He was at his best in the latter half of "Julius Caesar." He gave a very fine portrayal of the conqueror and the dictator; while it had the poise and dignity which all historians attribute to Caesar it never lacked force and fire at the right moments. There was perhaps too little change in appearance, the youth in the early twenties seemed much the same as the Caesar of matured manhood; the same applies to Caesar's first wife, Cornelia. The other actors and actresses were well directed and their performances were conscientious and creditable.

There is no question that much time, much ambitious effort, much ability of varied character and very much money has been spent on this production. The scale is lavish throughout. In the matter of costumes, armors, weapons, in fact, in all historical matters there is nothing less than perfection. The facilities of the Cines studio, their system and thoroughness in all such things are too well known to need mention here.

LUMIERE COMPANY ENJOINED.

Pending a final hearing on the issues involved in an infringement action brought by the Goodwin Film & Camera Company against the Lumiere Jougla Company, of 75 Fifth avenue, Judge Mayer, of the United States District Court, has issued a preliminary injunction enjoining the defendant from manufacturing or selling celluloid pellicles, which are alleged to constitute a violation of the rights of the plaintiff.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

By G. P. von Harleman.

MAURICE FLECKLES, general manager of Laemmle Film Service, is back, safe and sound, in Chicago, after eleven weeks of most exciting travel in the European war zone. Mr. Fleckles left Chicago the 16th of August and sailed from New York on the steamship Amsterdam for Holland en route to Germany to bring back home his wife and her sister, Mrs. Carl Laemmle, with her two children. Mrs. Laemmle and Mrs. Fleckles had spent the summer with the old folks in Fliden bei Fulda and, like a number of other Americans, when the war broke out they were unable to get out of the country. It is an interesting and exciting story Mr. Fleckles relates of his harrowing experiences on land and sea before he finally succeeded in getting his wife and her sister out of war-stricken Europe.

Early on the morning of September 2nd, Mr. Fleckles begins his story, the passengers on the liner Amsterdam were awakened by a cannon shot. The excitement was intense and everybody, regardless of dress, rushed up on the deck. The much dreaded had happened—the ship was captured, and, big and threatening, less than a mile away, loomed the sinister hull of a French man-of-war. The cause for anxiety was well founded, for the Amsterdam, though a Dutch steamer and belonging to a neutral nation, carried contraband of war. About 750 German and Austrian reservists were on board, bound for the war zone, and the liner was trying to elude the French and English warships and make a dash for a Dutch port.

The Amsterdam was taken by the French warship to the city of Brest, on the French coast, and convoyed into the harbor by eight torpedo boats. The navigation was very slow and careful on account of the numerous mines laid down for miles to protect the city. The flotilla arrived in port 10:30 o'clock in the evening. All the passengers were immediately lined up and their papers examined. Those not having satisfactory passports were taken off. This, of course, was the tragic fate of the 750 German and Austrian reservists.

One Austrian became so enraged and desperate that he struck a French officer in the face. An order was given; the man taken aside. A few soldiers formed a little squad and shot the offender, killing him instantly. The whole execution took less than a minute and the unloading of men and cargo proceeded as if nothing had happened. However, the incident made a profound impression on all the passengers. The steamer carried a great cargo of various food articles and supplies, which were all promptly confiscated. It took six days to unload the valuable cargo, which, among other things, contained a million and a half dollars of bar silver. On the 7th day of September, at six o'clock in the evening, the steamer was released and immediately resumed its journey to Holland.

The ship was stopped again at ten o'clock the next morning by another French man-of-war, who merely inspected the captain's papers and then allowed it to proceed. At two o'clock the same day an English man-of-war hailed the steamer and also inspected the papers. This same afternoon, when the ship again was on its way, the passengers on board were most surprised to find that one of the German reservists was still left on the ship. He had hidden among the dirty linen in the room provided for that purpose. The poor man was almost dead, as he had had nothing to eat nor drink for seven days.

On the 10th of September the ill-fated steamer finally arrived in Rotterdam. Glad to be on terra firma again, but anxious to proceed, Mr. Fleckles took the very first train out of Rotterdam and Holland, crossing the German border to Frankfurt-on-the-Main. He had to change cars eight times, and it took him thirty-eight hours to reach this city, which is thirty hours more than the usual schedule. He had to show his passport at the border, and it was inspected very carefully. Only those having passes of neutral countries were allowed to cross into Germany. From Frankfurt it is only a short trip to Fliden bei Fulda, a little town of about 3,000 inhabitants, and which is the home of Mrs. Fleckles and Mrs. Carl Laemmle. The two ladies had spent the entire summer there with their parents, and it is needless to say that our man was welcome.

After resting up for a couple of days in the bosom of his family, Mr. Fleckles went to visit some of his friends and relatives in Laupheim, which town is interesting to us, being the birthplace of Carl Laemmle. From there he went to Munich, where a brother of Carl Laemmle lives, and then returned to Frankfurt, proceeding from there to Cologne, on the Rhine.

The bridge across the Rhine is heavily mined and electrically wired. It is one of the biggest and most important bridges in Germany, and should the enemy try to effect a crossing, a press on a button is all that would be required to blow the bridge and the invaders to smithers. In crossing this bridge the trains had to proceed painfully slow and all windows had to be closed. From the time the war was declared up to the 28th of September, 36,000 trains of soldiers have passed this bridge on their way to the front.

The town of Cologne is in perfect darkness after 9:00 o'clock at night. Only gigantic searchlights ply the heavens guarding this big and important city from any attempted aerial attacks. This kills the picture business, of course, Mr. Fleckles said, in Cologne as well as in any other town on or near the border line. Otherwise picture theaters are running all over Germany, but are using mostly old stuff, as Germany is practically isolated from the rest of the world, and all plants are closed down.

From Cologne our man went to Rotterdam, trying to book a passage for himself and the ladies to England. This was not an easy thing to accomplish, as everything was taken weeks ahead of time. Not being able to get a berth, he went from Rotterdam to Flushing to see if it was possible to get a passage to England. At that time Antwerp was taken, and 60,000 refugees crowded into Flushing, trying to get across the channel. Flushing is only a short distance from Antwerp, and Mr. Fleckles said that he could see through field glasses the shelling and burning of this unfortunate city. "So I can truly say," he added, "that I am an eye witness to the siege and fall of Antwerp, one of the greatest events in modern history."

Not being able to get a passage across to England, Mr. Fleckles went back to Rotterdam and stayed there for a few days, when he was fortunate enough to secure a booking on the liner Rotterdam, on which he sailed from the city of Rotterdam, October 15th, bound for New York, accompanied by his wife and Mrs. Carl Laemmle and her two children. The trip was uneventful and the ship not molested by any warships. "The Rotterdam landed in New York October 24th, and, believe me," concluded our narrator, "we were mighty glad to get back to good old U. S. A."

Nebraska and South Dakota Have Fine Moving Picture Theatres.

Royale Valray Rothermel, Nebraska representative for the Paramount Film Corporation, made a call, this week, at the Chicago offices of the Moving Picture World.

Mr. Rothermel says that he has traveled quite extensively over Nebraska and South Dakota, and his opinion is that these two states have unusually fine and well conducted moving picture theaters. It is remarkable to see, he says, some of the picture houses in little towns of only 2,000 inhabitants and even less—regular theater brick buildings that some cities much larger could be proud of. The admission charged in many of these small town theaters is as high as 15 cents for a regular program and 25 cents for features. Most of the exhibitors use a thirty-day service and pick out their programs rather for quality than lateness of release date. A thirty-day service is considered quite satisfactory, and only a few theaters in Lincoln and some of the larger cities use what you call a first run service. But what about the condition of the film, we inquired. After a run of thirty days, if it is anything like in Chicago, it would hardly be called satisfactory. Well, he says, you would be surprised to see the stuff. It looks almost as new, and both film exchanges and exhibitors take very good care of the film.

By the way, Mr. Rothermel says you will not find the finest theaters in the largest cities, by any means. Lincoln, for instance, the capital and largest city in Nebraska, has less first class moving picture theaters in proportion than many of the smaller cities. However, there is a very fine and well conducted house in Lincoln, the Magnet theater, seating 900 people and running straight pictures.

The finest theater in the state, according to Mr. Rothermel, will be the Empress, in Freemont, a city of only 5,000 inhabitants. The house is not yet completed. It will seat over 1,000 people, and open for pictures around Christmas. The owner is Nels Johnson, a local real estate man. Quite a theater, I dare say, for a little city of 5,000. The whole town must go to picture shows at night to support such a big house.

In Beatrice, a city of 9,000, a picture house seating about 1,200 will be opened the first of the year. This house will cost about $65,000, and is owned by Wm. B. Gilbert, a local contractor.

One of the prettiest theaters in the state of Nebraska is the Dean Theater, in York, a city of 2,000 inhabitants. According to Mr. Rothermel, the Dean is one of the best conducted moving picture theaters he ever saw. The owner, G. W. Ballenger, puts on his pictures to perfection. Not satisfied with the electric light service of the city, he has an electric light plant of his own. The plant is installed in a small brick building, built for this purpose, adjoining the rear of the theater. The house has a seating capacity of 400, and admission charged is 10 and 20 cents.

South Dakota has a number of good theaters. It is the usual thing there that exhibitors get 15 cents for regular programs and 25 cents and more for features. In Mitchell, South Dakota, is a man who runs his comedies backwards. However, only once a week, and it makes a great hit with the natives. This man also has a five-piece orchestra to play not only for the pictures, but at the same time for the people on the street. The musicians are placed somewhere around the operating booth, facing directly the passing throngs on the sidewalk. Somebody ought to try that little stunt in Chicago!

Hugo Sonnenshein and Charles H. Kusel have sold to Nathan Ascher and James F. Greenbaum, 4730 Sheridan road, a plot 100 ft. x 150 ft., consideration withheld. This faces opposite Lakeside place, where it ends at Sheridan road, and is one-half block north of Wilson avenue. Kusel & Harris have contracted to build at that place a two-story brick and terra cotta building to contain four stores, offices on the second floor, and a high moving picture theater. The theater will be known as the Lakeside, and will have a seating capacity of 1,000. It is said that it will be the most beautiful moving picture house in Chicago. Ralph C. Harris is the architect. The entire transaction involves, it is said, $150,000. Gus M. Greenebaum represented all the parties to the transaction. Lewis F. Jacobson attended to the legal details for the purchasers, and Sonnenshein, Berkson & Fishel were attorneys for the sellers. The theatre will be under the direction of the Ascher Brothers, who own the Panorama, President and Cosmopolitan theaters on the south side.

Rogers Park Wants Better Pictures for School Children.

Preliminary steps were taken in a meeting held Friday, November 6th, in the Armstrong school of Rogers Park, fashionable suburb of Chicago, to obtain better and cleaner moving pictures for children, and the plans formulated will be submitted to the parents of the community for their approbation Tuesday evening of next week. It is the purpose and ambition of the originators of this movement to make it an extension of the social center and a means for providing entertainment of an elevating character for parent and pupil alike.

"We hope to win the children from the cheap and many times harmful forms of amusement that so many of our picture theaters afford, by giving them better pictures for less money and in an atmosphere catering to the best interests of our future citizens," said Alcie Brackett, who is the prime mover in the movement at the Armstrong school. "Good, clean pictures of every kind will be included in the daily programs and a special effort will be put forth to correlate such pictures as nearly as possible with the work of the classroom. Exhibitions will be given in the afternoons and evenings and we are sure that the parents of our community will become as enthusiastic over the venture as the children. If the parents favor the plan, as I expect them to do, it will be submitted to the board of education for final approval, in which case it will be immediately put into effect."

Films Made from Skimmed Milk Exhibited at Dairy Show.

The menace of a "film famine," which, following the European war outbreak, threatened to tie up the American moving picture industry, has been banished. Moving picture film is now being made out of skimmed milk. The first roll of practical skimmed milk film was shown in Chicago last week in the exhibit of the Illinois state food commission at the National Dairy Show.

Other uses for skimmed milk by-products are the making of coat buttons, collar buttons and piano keys. Samples of such unique manufacturing feats were displayed by W. Scott Matthews, state food commissioner. Ye gods, what next?

Weigle's wonderful war pictures were shown to the Chicago censor board at the rooms of Major M. L. C. Funkhouser, Saturday, November 7th. The film is called "On the Belgian Battlefields," and was taken by Edwin F. Weigle, staff photographer of the Chicago Daily Tribune. The Tribune was given the exclusive right by the Belgian government to take moving pictures in the Belgian war zone. The pictures show the battles of Alost, of Lierre, of Aerschot, of Malines, and the fall of Antwerp. There are 4,500 feet of film, divided into four reels. A public exhibition will be given at the La Salle Opera House Tuesday, the 10th of November.

Hugo Amberg, formerly traveling representative for Laemmle Film Service, and who recently was sent to Berlin as publicity manager for the Universal Film Mfg. Co. in Germany, has been drafted in the German army, and is now on the firing line. The Chicago office of the Laemmle Film Service received a letter from the young man last week, telling all about the hardships of a soldier's life, and sending a "good-bye" to all his friends over here, in case something should happen to him. Mr. Amberg is of German descent and has a host of friends in Chicago.

NOTICES.

A man using the name C. A. Allen has been representing himself as being an employee of the Gaumont Company throughout the Western States. This man has never been connected in any way with the Gaumont Company. Through his alleged connection with the Gaumont Company this man recently succeeded in procuring from a party in Bellingham, Washington, three hundred feet of valuable scenic film. Please be guided accordingly.

LIEUTENANT PATIN GOES TO THE FRONT.

M. Claude Patin, secretary of the Eclair Company, who is now a lieutenant in the French army, writes from the Creusot works, France, where he has been detailed, that he is about to go to the front. Le Creusot is where the famous artillery of France is made and Lieutenant Patin, attached to that arm of the service, is about to accompany a battery to the firing line. The Moving Picture World wishes for him a safe return.

Doings at Los Angeles.

WE had our first rain of the year this week. A foggy day, followed by light showers throughout the evening and a short pouring of water from the skies, and a day following of lovely sunniness put the directors out for a while, but they came back strong with the cleared atmosphere. California is at its best only after a rain, when the air becomes as clear as crystal.

It is said here that the moving picture people are only temporary visitors. Some persons put forth opinions before investigation. If space permitted, a list about a yard long could be prepared showing the large amount of lots, houses, land, various businesses, and automobiles owned by picture folks. Just the same the players are very welcome, and their cozy homes around the cities show their faith in the Southland.

The Oz Co. ran for the first time before the public "The Last Egyptian," the desert story from the book by L. Frank Baum. J. Farrel McDonald played the title role and was ably supported by charming Vivian Reed, the Oz girl, with her million dollar smile. The story is a wonderful one, having the thrill and punch in it that puts it among the leaders of current releases. The settings are wonderfully similar to the country by the Nile, and the whole atmosphere of the picture shows much thought and preparation.

The Photoplayers did themselves and their managers proud on Hallow'en when they turned away hundreds of people at the Mason opera house with their benefit vaudeville performance. Many filmdom stars participated and the many turns before the footlights instead of the diffusers brought the people to the realization that screen artists are good on as well as off the stage.

"Who Shot Bud Walton?" is the title of a mysterious drama being put on at the Mutual studio by Jack Adolfi. The detective and criminal points are so finely worked out in this play that the beholder almost becomes a living part of the picture, so intensely interesting is the action of the murder and its detection.

Bessie Barriscale is being featured in Thomas H. Ince's picture this week and is working hard to finish the picture as soon as possible. Howard Hickman is appearing in a big story of a great daily paper under the direction of Reginald Barker. Raymond B. West, who put on the big fairy picture, is assisting Mr. Ince.

James Dayton, specialist in scenarios at the Big U place, has returned from a motor tour to San Diego. Rhea Mitchell of the Broncho forces has also come back from a vacation by auto to the southern metropolis. She is now working with W. S. From a captain of police to a big fat country boy in the pictures is the life story of Bill Cavanaugh, at present engaged with the New York Company as stockman. He is possessed of a generous supply of superfluous weight, as he says, "Roscoe Arbuckle has nothing on me for excess baggage."

Lillian and Dorothy Gish will be seen shortly in a picture. This is the first time in over a year that the two popular sisters have worked together in the same film, and admirers will be glad to see them together again. The story is "The Sisters," and the plot is taken from the experiences of two country maids who come to the city. Two opposites later show the story, one remaining the sweet country girl while the other becomes a hardened woman of the world.

Gretchen Lederer has been seen in so many New York releases that she has become well known everywhere.

MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION MEETING.

A meeting of the manufacturers interested in forming an organization for the purpose of holding trade expositions will be held at the Hotel Wellington, N. Y. C., Tuesday, evening, November 17. Eight o'clock is the hour. It is reported that the committee appointed at the last meeting to secure definite information regarding the cost of holding such an exposition has secured all the required data and will make a report.

EASTMAN COMPANY DENIES ALLEGATIONS.

The Eastern Kodak Company, named as defendant in a Sherman anti-trust suit in the United States District Court to recover treble damages of $3,000,000, contends that cameras and photographic supplies are not classified in the category of necessities and hence the statute does not apply to its business.

Consequently the question of the jurisdiction of the court to litigate the suit is raised in the company's answer to the suit filed by its attorneys, Hubbell, Goodwin & Moser.

Answering the allegations contained in the complaint the company denies that it acquired a majority of the capital stock in a number of competitors including the General Aristo Company, the Rochester Optical Company and the Photo Materials Company to effect a merger which in effect resulted in a monopoly of the business, and asks that the complaint be dismissed.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS HELP WAR CHARITY.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Greater New York, comprising almost every motion picture theater in the city, in conjunction with the War Children's Christmas Fund, of which Mrs. John Hayes Hammond is National Chairman, and Miss Mary Garrett Hay is Secretary, will give special performances in the various theaters of New York to assist in the collection of gifts for the war stricken children of Europe. It is estimated that the proceeds of these benefits will make five thousand children in Europe happy on Christmas morn.

Motion Picture Laws.

A Digest of Legislative Enactments Relating to Motion Picture Theatres on the Statute Books of Various States.

Collated by W. Stephen Bush.

FOR the benefit of its readers The Moving Picture World has compiled a digest of laws relating to motion picture interests. Requests for information have been sent to forty states and thirty-five answers have been received in all. We have endeavored to supply the missing links as far as possible by consulting the session laws of all the states for the last five years. There is, even at this time, a large number of states in which no special legislation in regard to motion pictures has been enacted. In such states the motion picture comes under the general classification of "shows and amusements." We realize that new legislation is being constantly put on the statute books and that some of this legislation will directly or indirectly affect motion pictures. We will as far as possible keep track of such legislation and report it for the benefit of our readers.

We suggest to our readers to keep copies of all issues containing this information because they will be of permanent value as a means of handy reference.

The states have been arranged in alphabetical order and, as much ground will be covered, they will run through a number of issues of the paper.

Alabama.

There are no state laws affecting motion picture interests as such. In many of the minor political subdivisions of the state, cities, towns and counties there are local regulations.

Arkansas.

There are neither state nor county laws covering motion pictures. There are local regulations in most of the cities.

Colorado.

No state laws on the subject of motion pictures. Local ordinances in most cities.

Connecticut.

The only state laws on the subject are represented by Chapter 205 of Public Acts of 1909, the text of which is as follows:

Section 1. No moving picture machine involving the use of a combustible film more than ten inches in length shall be operated in any public building or place used for public assemblage or entertainments unless the moving picture machine and all of the combustible films to be used therein are placed in an enclosure or house made of fireproof material, such enclosure or house to be constructed according to such requirements as may be prescribed by the State Police; nor shall any moving picture machine be operated on the premises of a public building or place used for public assemblage or entertainments until such precautions against loss of or injury to life by fire as the State Police may specify have been taken by the owner, user, or exhibitor of such moving picture machine. The fee for inspecting the enclosure or house surrounding any moving picture machine shall be five dollars for each inspection, which shall be paid by the owner or operator of such machine; no charge, however, shall be made for inspections made after a certificate of approval of such enclosure or house has been issued by the Chief of the State Police.

Section 2. The State Police are hereby empowered and directed to inspect any moving picture machine involving the use of a combustible film more than ten inches in length which is used or kept on premises designated in Section 1 and to make such rules and regulations as they may deem necessary for the safe use of such apparatus.

Section 3. No person shall operate a moving picture machine involving the use of a combustible film more than ten inches in length until he has received a license to do so from the State Police. The fee for such license shall be three dollars. Such license shall be for the term of one year from the date thereof, and may be renewed yearly without examination upon the payment of a fee of one dollar. No license shall be granted to any person under twenty-one years of age, nor until the applicant shall have passed an examination and shall have been found thoroughly skilled in the working of the mechanical and electrical apparatus of the moving picture machine to be used by such applicant. No license shall be granted to operate a moving picture machine by oxyhydrogen gas, so called, or by lime-light.

Section 4. Any person of the age of twenty-one years or over, who has been examined in any other State of the United States as to his ability to operate a moving picture machine, and has passed a satisfactory examination and received a license or certificate from such State, shall be permitted to operate a moving picture machine within this State for a period of not more than thirty days.

Section 5. Any person using or operating a moving picture machine involving the use of a combustible film more than ten inches in length, contrary to the provisions of this Act, or in violation of any rule or regulation made by the State Police, or of any regulation or requirement made by the Chief of the State Police in accordance with the provisions hereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars.

Section 6. The Superintendent of the State Police shall render a monthly account to the Comptroller of all sums received by him and his assistants under the provisions of this act and pay the same to the Treasurer of the State.

It will be observed that the law empowers the state police to make such rules and regulations "as they may deem necessary for the safe use of such apparatus." Acting under this provision of the statute the state police have prescribed certain requirements, which affect the buildings in which exhibitions take place and the booths in which the machines have to be placed. The most important building requirements are as follows:

Exit stairways must meet the approval of State Superintendent of Police in the matter of size, construction and material. Chairs must be fastened to the floor. No one is allowed to stand in the aisles or block the exits. Exits are to be plainly marked with letters five inches high, illuminated and red. Doors must open outward. Moving picture shows will generally not be approved in any tenement building or buildings in which people reside. Fee is required for each inspection before certificate of approval is issued.

The rules concerning booths are as follows:

FRAME. Booths shall be constructed with a steel frame; angle or tee iron to be 1½ in. x 1½ in. x ¼ in.—minimum size. Intermediate uprights to be not more than two feet apart.

COVER. The cover will consist of asbestos board (asbestos sheet mill board, so-called, will not be permitted in any case), at least one-fourth of one inch (¼ in.) thick to be securely bolted to the frame. The asbestos covering shall be outside the frame.

FLOOR. The floor to be of ⅜ in. Asbestos board laid over a level, firm, secure wooden floor.

MAIN DOOR. The door shall open outward. It shall be six feet high and two feet wide (6′ x 2′). It shall be provided with a metal stop to prevent it swinging into the booth.

WINDOWS. The windows must be provided with gravity doors so constructed that when closed they will overlap the opening by at least one inch. Windows, while open, to be held in place by a fine combustible cord attached to a fusible link. Cord to be located within easy reach of the operator.

VENTILATION. On each of the four sides of the booth, about three inches (3 in.) from the floor, there must be an opening fifteen inches by three inches (15 in. x 3 in.). Covered with a wire net of ⅛ inch mesh. Net to be securely fastened to inside of booth. Near the center of the top of the booth must be placed a circular vent pipe of at least ten inches in diameter, this pipe to lead to outside of building, or to an especially constructed vent flue.

In this vent pipe there will be placed a box containing a twelve-inch (12 in.) electric fan. Fan box to be so constructed that it can be easily examined and door to be always kept closed with proper fastenings. Fan to be controlled from inside the booth.

WIRING. All wires to be brought into the booth in conduits.

PERMANENT BOOTH—SEMI-PORTABLE TYPE. This type of booth is permitted in any theater, exactly as a Permanent Booth would be used. This Department advises, however, that the regulation type be used in all Regular Moving Picture Theaters.

The booth shall be constructed of structural steel as follows: frame uprights 1¼″ x 1¼″ x 3/16″, intermediate vertical supports to be not over 4′ apart. Otherwise same as permanent type.

Door frame to be 1″ x 1″ x 3/16″.

Strap Iron for horizontal support and covering joints to be 2″ x ⅛″.

Cover to be of asbestos board ¼″ minimum thickness for sides and top and may be placed inside the frame. Floor to be same as regulation type. The booth shall be otherwise constructed according to regulations laid down for permanent booths. No change or enlargement of booths shall be made without the approval of the Superintendent of State Police. Certificate of Approval shall be revoked if any alterations or changes are made contrary to the foregoing regulations and without permission from the Superintendent of State Police.

There are also regulations in regard to machines and operators. Summarized and condensed they provide for the following:

No clothing can be kept in booth unless a special closet is provided. Switch for control of current must be within easy reach of the operator, machine switch to be encased in an iron box. Booth door must always be closed but never locked.

Nothing combustible or inflammable except films will be allowed inside the booth. If clothing is to be kept inside the booth a closet will be required.

Switch for control of current to be within easy reach of the operator, machine switch to be encased in an iron box.

All wires must be properly insulated.

If the house lights are controlled inside the booth an emergency switch shall be placed near the main entrance.

Booth doors shall be always kept closed;——but never locked.

SMOKING in or around the booth is forbidden.

Operators shall always have their licenses with them while inside the booth.

An approved automatic drop shutter must be upon all machines and always kept in working order.

A shutter must be placed in front of the condenser so as to be instantly closed when necessary.

The films must be wound upon a metal reel encased in an iron box with a slot in the bottom only large enough to permit the film to pass through a set of metal rollers, which must fit tightly to the film. The joints necessary in the construction of this box must be made tight without the use of solder.

The cover which admits of the placing or removing of the reel in said box must have hinges so arranged that it will at all times close tight, and be provided with a fastening to lock when closed. Under this box must be arranged a box of similar design and construction, containing a reel for the reception of the film from the box above, with a slot in top and with a set of rollers as directly under the top box as possible; the film to be conducted from the upper magazine or box and thence into the lower magazine or box of the same construction.

All films while not in use to be kept in boxes of similar construction to those required by the above paragraph, and repaired or rewound inside booth. The operator shall not be allowed to rewind a film or leave the booth while the machine is in operation.

Arc lamp to be covered with an iron box.

All Incandescent lamps shall be covered with wire guards.

Rheostat, or other device answering same purpose, must be covered with perforated sheet iron or heavy wire mesh. Must be properly insulated and securely fastened to its support and the support to the floor.

Machine must be securely fastened to its support and the support to the floor.

Proper fuses shall be provided to prevent the carrying of too great a current. Maximum voltage must never exceed 110 Volts.

No machine shall be operated more than twenty minutes without a stop of at least five minutes.

Within twenty-four hours after any fire or accident the operator and manager shall make a written report of said fire or accident to the State Police Dept., Hartford.

SPECIAL CERTIFICATE OF APPROVAL may be granted for single exhibitions of Moving Pictures in School Houses, Churches, Lodge Rooms, Club Rooms, Hotels, etc., with the use of an asbestos portable booth. The booth to consist of an iron pipe frame entirely covered with asbestos cloth located, constructed and connected to meet with the approval of the Superintendent of State Police.

New Regulations For Storing Film.

Recommendations to Be Submitted to National Fire Protection Association's Executive Committee.

THROUGH the kindness of George P. Enke, M. E., the Moving Picture World is enabled to print the rules and requirements governing the storage and handling of nitro-cellulose motion picture film as recommended by the National Fire Protection Association. Some changes in existing rules have been made in order to meet criticism that were passed at the annual meeting last May. The following rules will come before the executive committee at its meeting early in January for such alteration, if any, as may be decided upon, with the prospect that during the same month the regulations approximately as they now stand will be enforced as the decision of the National Association:

Storage of Nitro-Cellulose Motion Picture Films.

Nitro-cellulose motion picture films should preferably be stored in a separate building or vault, not exposing other property or occupancy; if a limited quantity is permitted in a building with other occupancy, or in an exposed building, it must be in standard fireproof vaults, safes or cabinets.

1. Film Reels. Each reel of film shall be kept in a separate metal box with tight-fitting cover, except when in use.

Note.—A reel ordinarily carrying 1,000 feet of film, 11 1 32 inches wide, and weighs about 5 pounds; diameter of reel is approximately 10 inches.

2. Vaults. Where the maximum degree of protection for valuable films is the primary consideration, vaults shall be constructed according to requirements for Class A vaults. This type of vault involves massive construction designed to resist long-continued fire, impact of falling bodies and attack by burglars (in so far as this feature can properly be incorporated in these specifications). Where the primary consideration is to minimize the fire hazard in a building incident to the films therein, vaults shall be constructed in accordance with the requirements for Class A, B or C vaults. No one vault or compartment shall exceed in size 750 cubic feet. To prevent abnormal temperature within the vault, glass windows and skylights should be avoided; likewise proximity to boiler stacks and similar sources of heat.

3. Safes. Size not to exceed 150 cubic feet. Safes shall have an angle iron frame at least ¼x¼x2 inches and continuous at all edges. On safes larger than 40 inches high, 30 inches wide and 30 inches deep, an additional stiffening of heavy steel at least ¼ inch thick, and of width proportioned to size, but never less than 2 inches, shall be used at top, bottom and sides. Sheet steel plates shall be not less than No. 12 U. S. gauge for the outer shell and not less than No. 14 for the inner shell. Filling to be of cement concrete or its equivalent not less than 5½ inches thick, except that the doors may have 4 inches of concrete and a 2-inch sealed air space; this space may be used for the lock and bolts. Door shall have stepped sides so as to be smoke-proof. No cast iron to be used in the construction of the safe, except such parts as casters, hinges and flanged door frames.

4. Pressure Relief for Vaults and Safes. Vaults and safes shall have an opening to the outside of the building directly through wall or a flue with masonry walls at least 4 inches thick; sectional area of opening shall be at least 50 square inches (if size of vault or safe is less than 150 cubic feet the opening may have a sectional area of 15 square inches). Pipes to connect relief opening in vault to the outside may be permitted inside buildings equipped with an approved system of automatic sprinklers; they shall be of metal not less than No. 18 United States gauge in thickness. Pipes run inside building shall be rigidly supported and covered with at least one inch of approved heat insulating material. The outlet shall not expose or be exposed by other property; it shall be shielded from the weather and provided with a wire screen of not larger than ¼ inch mesh.

5. Ventilation of Vaults and Safes. There should be no ventilation of safes and vaults other than a pressure relief opening, discharging directly to the outside of the building. Blower systems circulating air in the safe or vault are objectionable, even after every reasonable safeguard has been provided.

Artificial ventilation of vaults is sometimes desired in factories handling fresh material as in motion picture film printing establishments. In such cases the additional fire hazard in connection with the ventilation may be somewhat reduced if the intake and discharge openings in the vault connect directly to the outside of the building through wall or a flue with masonry walls at least 4 inches thick. Pipes to connect vent openings in vaults to the outside may be permitted inside buildings equipped with an approved system of automatic sprinklers; they shall be of metal not less than No. 18 United States gauge in thickness, rigidly supported and covered with at least one inch of approved heat insulating material. The outlet shall not expose or be exposed by other property; it shall be shielded from the weather and provided with a wire screen of not larger than ¼ inch mesh. Only suction blowers drawing air away from the vault shall be used.

6. Cabinets. Two hundred reels of film weighing not more than one thousand pounds in the aggregate may be stored in cabinets, but no one cabinet shall contain more than 50 reels (250 pounds). When more than one cabinet is used, there shall be at least 10 feet clear space between each cabinet and the cabinets shall be in a separate room inclosed by incombustible partitions with fire doors of the corridor type at communications.

Cabinets shall be tightly inclosed and may be made of suitably stiffened sheet iron at least No. 18 United States gauge in thickness, double walled with 1½ inch of air space; doors shall be constructed equivalent to walls of the cabinet, shall be self-closing, fit closely and be kept locked.

Each cabinet shall have a pressure relief opening extending independently to the outside of the building; sectional area of opening shall be at least 10 square inches. Pipes, if necessary to connect relief opening in cabinet to the outside, may be permitted inside buildings and shall be of metal not less than No. 18 United States gauge in thickness. Pipes run inside building shall be rigidly supported and covered with at least one inch of approved heat insulating material. The outlet shall not expose or be exposed by other property; it shall be shielded from the weather and provided with a wire screen of not larger than ¼ inch mesh.

Other containers having a capacity not exceeding 50 reels of film each and approved as the equivalent of the cabinets may be accepted in lieu thereof.

Handling of Nitro-Cellulose Motion Picture Film.

1. Printing, Developing, Examining, Repairing and Exchange Rooms. (a) Shall have outside ventilation and be separated from the balance of the building by tight partitions of incombustible material, with fire doors of the corridor type at communications; partitions, transoms and doors to contain no glass other than wired glass. (b) Such rooms to be used neither for storage nor handling of combustible materials, other than the films. The furnishings should be of incombustible material. (c) The number of reels of films exposed in a single room at any one time shall be limited to ten (10). (d) Reels containing films on printing and perforating machines shall be inclosed in magazines constructed according to the requirements for Motion Picture Machines.

2. Scrap and Waste. All scrap or waste shall be kept in self-closing standard metal waste cans or their equivalent, and removed from the building at least once each day to a safe location; such waste to be kept separate from paper waste or other rubbish.

3. Cement. Any compound of collodion and amyl acetate or similarly inflammable cements inside the building shall be limited to one gallon, not exceeding the quantity required each day.

4. Motion Picture Machines and Booths. Shall be safeguarded in accordance with the requirements of paragraphs 38 (U) and 38 (V) of the National Electrical Code. The booth may be omitted if the machines are in a separate room inclosed by incombustible partitions with fire doors of the corridor type at communications.

5. Power. Electric motors, if used, should preferably be of the induction type, without commutators, or, if of the direct current type, to have inclosed commutators. All switches, rheostats, or other current controlling devices must be inclosed in approved dust-proof and fire-proof cabinets.

6. Lighting. Shall be by incandescent electric lights only; lamps, if subject to mechanical injury, to be protected by approved wire guards. Entire installation shall be in accordance with the requirements of the National Electrical Code.

7. Heating. Only hot air, hot water or steam heat shall be used; the heating pipes to be preferably overhead attached to the ceiling. Steam and hot water pipes or radiators, if on side walls, shall be safeguarded by the use of sheet metal or heavy galvanized wire netting with not over ¼ inch mesh held firmly in place at least one inch from pipes, or by covering space between back of benches and walls with heavy galvanized wire netting, with not over ¼ inch mesh, securely stapled to bench and wall, but sloping so that it may not be used as a shelf. No hot air nor other floor registers shall be used; nor shall any register be less than 6 inches above the floor.

8. Smoking and Carrying of Matches. Shall be strictly prohibited.

9. Protection. All buildings containing factories or exchanges in which more than 50 reels of films (250 pounds) are stored or handled shall be equipped with an approved system of automatic sprinklers. Each room shall be equipped with at least one approved hand fire extinguisher. At least one pail of water and one pail of sand shall be provided for each vault, safe or cabinet in use.

Motion Picture Studios.

The provisions herein contained for storage and handling of films should be observed in establishments where the subjects are photographed. These plants usually introduce most of the hazards commonly found in theaters, and safeguards as provided in the standard specifications for theaters should be observed as far as practicable.

At Last the Worm Turns.

Stenographers' Protective Society of Los Angeles Protests Against "Unwarranted Caricaturing."

THE members of Stenographers' Protective Society No. 1, of Los Angeles, are indignant over what they describe as "unwarranted caricaturing of stenographers in film dramas and comedies." It just happens that the secretary of the society, Miss Adelaide Hollendorff, has had two scripts accepted by the Balboa company. Being in touch with the scenario department of that company, Miss Hollender has written to Scenario Editor Wiltermood asking him to enlist the aid of other editors in the society's crusade to prevent "the further unjust characterization in films of stenographers as silly, gum-chewing, over-dressed, immoral girls who allow employers to caress them."

"We respectfully appeal to you," says Miss Hollendorff in her communication, "to reject all submitted manuscripts which depict one or more of the characters as 'sporty' stenographers. There are doubtless more than 100,000 girls employed as typists in offices throughout the United States and it is an aspersion on the character of every one of these young women for film manufacturers to depict stenographers as being lewd in their attire and conduct. Please do what you can to call the attention of other studio editors to our campaign for our rights."

Beyond question the women, young and otherwise, behind this complaint have just ground for taking action. It is possible their appeal would have had more force had it been confined to comedies. In this class of photoplay production the stenographers have been considered fair game as marks for the shafts of the directors. In dramas, however, stenographers, as a general rule, have received due consideration.

THE ART OF EXHIBITION.

The Principal Aids in Presentation According to Rothapfel —What May Be Done with Light and Effects—How Unpromising Pictures May Be Made Presentable— "Realizing the Producers and the Director's Ideals."

By W. Stephen Bush.

"PURCHASERS of tickets are subject to delay." The black Hercules in the lobby of the Strand Theater addressed these words at intervals of about one minute to the great throng waiting for their chance to look at the screen within. An out-of-town exhibitor, one of the many who come to the Strand in search of new ideas in the art of presenting motion pictures, stood between Mr. Rothapfel and the writer and smilingly remarked:

"Well, you simply can't discourage them. They don't care about this 'subject to delay' announcement. We used to think that 'holding them' out in the lobby at the end of the first show was a pretty good sign of prosperity, but who in those old days would ever have expected anything like this? How do you do it Rothie?"

"Oh, I don't know," replied the master of the screen thus familiarly addressed, "I just go and git 'em."

This is a favorite phrase of Rothapfel, a motto and war-cry, neatly painted black on white, it hangs in his private office and it is often familiarly repeated by the men who work with him and for him and to whom he modestly assigns the greater share of his success.

"Really," he insisted, "I don't know myself what I will do next until I do it."

The Alphabet of Presentation.

"You are asking me now about the treatment of the picture and what you call presentation of the picture proper. Well, to begin with, I study my program on the screen. I let my mind dwell on the principal characters of the play. I try to follow and grasp the situations. I study the possibilities of the scenery; in fact, I go at it much as one would go at the solution of a puzzle. As I busy myself with this analytical process the problem presently becomes clear and one by one the puzzle unfolds itself. Sometimes this task of concentration is quite easy and ideas suggest themselves in abundance. One such picture was the 'County Chairman,' which we showed last week. It made me think of the days when the youngsters in my home town, myself among them, gathered in barrels and fences to burn on the night of election day, and when the rival brass bands in opposing political camps made the rural welkin hideous. I felt my audience would be affected in much the same way and I played on that chord all through the picture. We had a very short rehearsal and when we arranged the 'blue notes' in the rival bands the men in the orchestra fairly laughed their heads off. The whole thing was more like an hour of relaxation than a rehearsal."

"The Exhibitor a Realizer of the Producer's Ideals."

Rothapfel here pointed to one of the informal memorial tablets which decorate the walls of his office and I found beneath the words quoted, the signature of Frederick A. Thomson, who directed many famous Vitagraph productions.

"I quite agree with Mr. Thomson," said Rothapfel. "All exhibitors consciously or unconsciously aim at realizing the producer's ideals and I know that I utter the sentiments of all my brother exhibitors when I say that this task is a very hard one most of the time. After all, we are working with the thoughts and ideas of somebody else. These thoughts and ideas are frozen on the film; they are not flexible or plastic. The best then that we can do is to interpret what the director intended to convey, to emphasize and amplify his meaning. I try to read the mind not only of the director, but of the scenario writer as well, and I follow the actors very closely. Only in this way is it possible to do full justice to the combined efforts of the men in the studio."

The Four Great Aids of Presentation.

"The four great aids which exhibitors have in trying to strengthen and interpret the picture are light, music, the human voice and effects. I have spoken at some length on music in our last talk, but I assure you that I consider light just as important as music. The day will come when a motion picture theater will be constructed with an idea of utilizing the possibilities of light on the screen as well as on the audience. The skilful handling of light enters largely into the creation of atmosphere. I use light quite a good deal for the purpose of pleasing and holding the interest of my audience. Often the simplest idea is quite effective. Say, for instance, that I want to bring my audience out of a quiet or merry mood into the influence of pathos. I have the orchestra play a serenade by Schubert during which the stage is absolutely dark as well as the house, with the exception of a very faint light filtered and thrown toward the orchestra. I have the light reflected back on the singers' faces through the shimmer of the fountain. It is a delicate touch and always attains its purpose. I repeat that the possibilities of light in moving picture presentation are not thoroughly realized as yet. I find that the darkening of the house during a tense dramatic scene, the brightening of the house during a comedy never fails in psychological effect. Every picture theater should have its house lights and stage lights controlled by dimmers. If it is imposible to have a man on the stage to attend to this the operator should work them. I have often worked light effects in accentuating and bringing out dramatic climaxes. Plunge your house into entire darkness while the people on the screen are passing through a tunnel. These things may appear trifles but they help a good deal.

The Use of Familiar Melodies.

"There are pictures in which the use of an old familiar melody will establish very pleasing relations between the people on the screen and the people in front of the screen. I can best illustrate my meaning by referring to an example or two. In the 'County Chairman' the love affair between the leading character and the girl who married his rival is quite affecting. When the author shows how this affection persisted through all the years and how for the sake of these memories the county chairman forbears to wreak his vengeance, 'Auld Lang Syne' or 'Love's Own Sweet Song' will best express what arises in the hearts of the audience. Here it seems to me one must be careful not to bring in any other melody or theme as otherwise the harmony of ideas might suffer. Another example: In the 'Virginian' the leading character is seen silhouetted against the western sky. The simple melody 'Carry Me Back to Old Virginia' at once establishes sympathetic relations between the Virginian and his audience, who can almost guess his very thoughts. The same air also closed the picture as Farnum and Miss Kingston stand in front of the camp fire in the last scene. One method of insuring the best presentation possible is to inspire everybody connected with the show, the stage hands, the ushers, the musicians, etc., with a lively visible interest in the performance. I want everybody to be transported as it were, into the picture. This always reacts upon the audience and increases its own tensity and its own appreciation of realism.

Difficulties in Presentation.

"When pictures suffer from imperfections as they sometimes do, and from a lack of attention to detail, effective presentation becomes uphill work. Often a burden is put on the presentation which should have been shouldered in the first instance by the producer. One of the things that I find very annoying and hampering to exhibitors is the reckless use by directors and scenario writers of the so-called 'flash-back.' There is no reason why the effect of a 'flash-back,' intended by the director, cannot with equal force be accomplished through a dissolving scene. In this way the exhibitor is enabled to retain the basic theme in his music, etc. These 'flash-backs' often break up what would otherwise be a splendid effect and often may be dispensed with entirely. In the matter of ceremonies at well-known public or political functions or any matters of military detail many pictures, even such as come from the best studios, are incorrect or incomplete. What can the exhibitor do under such circumstances? He may be thoroughly familiar with all such details and anxious to work out their possibilities on the screen, but if we haven't got the right thing on the screen we cannot supply it from the outside. Sometimes we are able to put in details forgotten by the director, but often this is impossible and the blemish on the picture is incurable.

Why I Use Singers.

"Speaking of the aid which the human voice gives to the proper presentation of the picture, I think that good and capable singers help to round out the performance and add a touch of polish and elegance which every audience appreciates. I think, too, that a song wisely chosen and artistically rendered helps to rest the audience. I do not have to tell you that I consider the old-fashioned illustrated singer as an unmitigated horror and nuisance. I spoke of the choosing of songs. This is very important, for the character of the song must fit in thoroughly with the program. One must know where to put the light touch and where to use a stronger one. You have often seen me in here struggling with my singers, trying to get them to understand just what is expected of them; what their purpose is and what in my entertainment their limitations must be. The human voice, of course, is welcome at any entertainment. As a rule, the use of the graphophone is ill advised, but there are occasions when judiciously employed behind the screen, it may become a valuable aid, such for instance as imitating the gradual approach of a body of marching men or distant music. It may also be used, if sound judgment is exercised, to imitate the grumbling and murmurings of an excited mob that may be shown on the screen."

The Exhibitor with the Smaller Theater.

I asked Rothapfel what the man with limited means at his command could do by way of improving his presentation.

"No miracles are expected of him," Rothapfel replied. "He, too, can study the picture and treat it in the light of intelligent analysis. I think a dignified treatment of the pictures with well thought-out pianissimo effects on the piano is one way in which the smaller exhibitor can improve his presentation. If the operator, the musician and the exhibitor put their heads together and carefully and jointly study the picture many things will suggest themselves. With honest and enthusiastic co-operation the three of them will work out many a novel and striking thing, and if they can originate something, say only once a month, it will sow the seeds of more improvement, they will please their public and incidentally take renewed interest in their work.

"Most of the light effects of which I have spoken (and there are many more, I assure you) can be worked in a small house just as effectively as in a larger one. The projection in many a small house is much superior in quality to that in bigger houses. The operator and the pianist and the exhibitor in a small town and a small theater often feel their individual responsibility for giving a first-class show much keener than the managers in bigger places where things are often apt to degenerate into a routine and then into a rut.

Effects.

"I think," continued Rothapfel, "that the word 'effects' covers a very wide field. Do you know that the sense of smell may, at times, be appealed to and highly gratified? Let me give you an example: I was running a very humble theater when we got the 'Flower Parade at Pasadena.' I looked at the pictures and noticed that the prevailing flower was the rose. I bought an ounce of rose perfume dipped them in tiny paper streamers and as soon as we set the fans going we let the currents of the air blow the streamers all about the theater. I noticed that the audience looked very closely at the picture when the scent made itself felt. One young lady stopped me on going out and said: 'Why, Mr. Rothapfel, those rose pictures looked so natural I honestly thought I could smell the perfume of the rose.' There are certain scenes in 'Quo Vadis' where by the simple expedient of burning incense I intensified the atmosphere a hundred-fold. The same effect I produced by the burning of sulphur during the eruption of Vesuvius in 'The Last Days of Pompeii.'

"I should say that, as a general rule, it is safe to keep away from effects entirely in a dramatic production, unless, of course, the spectacular element is emphasized. The imitation behind the screen of galloping horses, of autos and trains, is, as a rule, ridiculous, and ought not be resorted to except in rare cases where such imitation may accentuate the dramatic value of the scene. If I were in doubt, however, I would always stay away from the effect in such a case rather than chance a burst of derision from my audience. Water, cleverly imitated, is all right in most cases; it is soothing and does not detract the attention too much. I take my effect men into my confidence and I have often spent an hour in getting a pistol shot or an explosion just right. Tell your effect-man just what you want and why you want it. The thin line which divides the sublime from the ridiculous is most easily transgressed by an overzealous effect-man who is left to his own discretion and who imagines that he must be heard to earn his salary. One of my pet abominations is the trap drummer. Effects should never be used in front of the screen anyway, except where they may be incorporated into the music as, for instance a touch on the cymbal or a roll of the drum, etc. Such 'effects' should be properly marked on the music score. The vulgar habit of making a staccato-like noise on the piano when kissing is shown on the screen is particularly offensive to good taste and I am sorry to say is very common in New York. The good Lord deliver us from all such nuisances."

CLEO MADISON BACK FROM VACATION.

Cleo Madison, of "Trey o' Hearts" fame, has returned from her well-earned week's vacation and, apparently in better health and spirits than she has been for a long time, announces that she is again ready to take up her work as leading lady with the Gold Seal company under Mr. Lucas' direction.

Florence Hackett

BECAUSE she is both a gifted actress and a superlative type of womanhood, Florence Hackett holds an enviable place among the circle of her intimates. The brilliant characterist of the Arthur V. Johnson photoplays is known to many by reason of her uncommonly able performances in Mr. Johnson's two and three reel features, as well as in scores of his single-reel comedies and dramas. Her rise is another instance of what talent, backed by brains and determination, will accomplish. Two and a half years ago she was assigned by the Lubin management to Mr. Johnson's company. At first she supplied "atmosphere," played minor character bits and was always in readiness to undertake what a more important player would decline. Then second parts were regularly assigned to her, and gradually the motion picture public came to associate her with Johnson photoplays. At this time she was given her first character lead and shortly afterward scored a series of successes in widely different roles in Mr. Johnson's important productions. To-day Florence Hackett parts are written for the actress. Let it be said that Florence Hackett parts are any which demand exceptional emotional strength and the ability to efface the player's personality completely. She is equally convincing and satisfying as a self-centered society butterfly or a grief-crazed fishwife. As Rosa, the Italian, in "The District Attorney's Conscience," Miss Hackett's artistry was seen in its fullest flower. Her transformation from an American gentlewoman of today to the tortured, frenzied wife of Tony was a coup which raised her from a merely competent actress to the valuable artist with a fixed future. Miss Hackett treasures a memento of that role in a letter received from a prominent criminal lawyer of New Orleans who, in a practice extending over twenty-eight years, declares that he has never seen so faithful a portrayal of the Italian temperament outside the courtroom. Yet as Julia Radnor, the capitalist's daughter, in "A Leader of Men," she was the woman of society—selfish, luxurious, steady in her purpose to gain her own ends, with all outward signs of the wretched Italian erased, and with no suggestion of Crazy Mary, the misjudged, forsaken wife of the fisherman in "The Sea Eternal," nor of the innocent Florence Randall in "The Parasite."

Florence Hackett.

It is just this skill in achieving definite characterizations which makes Miss Hackett's rank as an actress what it is, but her distinction as a woman is known only to her associates.

Hers is a character essentially appealing, for she embodies all the traits of ideal womanhood. Tender, sympathetic, modest, retiring—she is an actress because of necessity, not because she enjoys the excitement and shallow rewards of the life. A score of small, unobtrusive charities—kindnesses, she would call them—have endeared her to the rank and file of Lubin workers. They cannot be enumerated, but to those familiar with life in the average studio, there come to mind cases where a pair of warm gloves, a lift in one's motor to an old lady, or a doctor sent hurriedly to someone in distress would have been a Godsend. Behind a personality finished, cultured, rich in variety, Miss Hackett adheres to a simple purpose—To Help.

PEERLESS PLAYERS AT MARBLEHEAD, MASS.

Director O. A. C. Lund with a half dozen principals of The Peerless Feature Film Company, are at Marblehead, Mass., where he is directing a number of wreck scenes that are to be a part of "The Marked Woman," which the Peerless is to release shortly. The company will remain at the North Atlantic resort for about a fortnight according to the present arrangement. Those who are to enact roles in the wreck scenes are Miss Barbara Tennant, William C. Bailey, George Cowl, William Edmondson, Joseph Baker, Mary Nevarro and Fred "Daredevil" Probst.

Moving Picture Educator

Conducted by the REV. W. H. JACKSON

THE EDUCATIONAL PICTURE.

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

Oregon Fish and Game.

FOR the last three years Mr. William L. Finley, the author, naturalist and sportsman of Portland, Oregon, has, with a companion, been cruising the great tule marshes, that but few men have ever seen, making pictures of the great bird colonies in the lake region of Southern Oregon, which was set aside as a wild bird reservation of the federal government by a special proclamation of President Roosevelt in 1908. Mr. Finley has spent many years in the field with his camera and notebook and is one of the greatest living authorities on his subject. He has worked with both the Oregon and Federal governments and as a lecturer for the National Association of Audubon Societies in furtherance of game protection and propagation.

Children and the Birds.

One reel is taken up with showing the important educational work undertaken by many states and schools to interest children in the preservation of song birds, by teaching them to build bird houses and how to care for the inmates of them during the winter months. The remainder of his pictures which are entitled "The State, the Sportsman and the Game" is in six reels. The first reel is of a general character and illustrates how game is raised for stocking purposes, and how it is transported to fields that need stocking. On this reel also are general views of the Oregon lake region and incidents of the adventures of Mr. Finley and his companion, vast colonies of sea birds, sea lions at home and interesting views of the sea parrot.

Trout and Salmon Fishing.

The next three reels are devoted to the angler and the fisherman. This shows among other things the falls of the Willamette and the salmon leaping the cascades, the hooking, struggle for and final landing by a fisherman of a large Chinook salmon, and the sport of fishing for trout in the Rogue river. Many interesting and valuable pictures of these and other fish in their home life are also shown.

The Hatcheries.

The next two and last reels are given over to showing the great Oregon hatchery in operation, how the river is racked to hold the fall run of the Chinook salmon, how the male and female fish are selected, how they are cared for during spawning time, and the methods of handling and transporting the young fish to the streams where they are to be planted.

More Voting Contests.

The picture field seems to be a most fertile soil for voting contests of all kinds. In addition to the many that we have already had or that are now going on, the Philadelphia "North American" has started another one for equipping certain of the Pennsylvania and New Jersey schools with the Edison School Kinetoscope. We give below the details of the competition, the method of counting the votes and a description of the prize outfits to be awarded.

Details of the Competition.

The North American's Edison School Kinetoscope Contest is to determine which schools in Philadelphia, Bucks, Chester, Delaware and Montgomery counties, Pennsylvania; Camden and Gloucester counties, New Jersey, and the city of Wilmington, Del., are to receive thirty-three Edison school kinetoscope outfits, to be given away by The North American, as follows:

Two Edison school kinetoscope outfits to the two schools in each of the ten school districts of Philadelphia which receive the largest number of votes in their respectve districts.

Under the same terms, two school kinetoscope outfits each will be awarded to the schools of Bucks, Montgomery, Chester and Delaware counties, in Pennsylvania; two to schools in the city of Wilmington, Del.; two to schools in the city and county of Camden, N. J., and one to a school in Gloucester county, N. J.

Any school, public, parochial or private, in the districts named is eligible to the competition.

Schools should be nominated by a pupil or a teacher. In case of a nomination by a pupil, a teacher or a parent of the pupil should also sign the nomination.

How the Votes Will Count.

The winners in the competition are to be determined by the number of votes in favor of the schools in the districts named. Prizes are to be awarded for highest totals in each district.

The count will be based upon coupons sent to The North American and upon subscriptions to the daily and Sunday North American upon which credit for votes is requested. A coupon will be printed in each issue of The North American until November 15. A coupon from a daily issue of the paper will, when properly filled in with the name of a school, count one vote in favor of the school named. A coupon from a Sunday issue of The North American will, when properly filled in with the name of a school, count ten votes. All coupons, in order to be counted, must be received at The North American office on or before the expiration date printed on the face of the coupons.

All votes, to be counted, must reach The North American on or before November 20. Announcement of the result will be made in The North American on Sunday, November 29.

In addition to the coupon votes described above, subscriptions to The North American will be counted as below, but only when the school which is to benefit by the subscription is named when the order is received. Subscriptions must be accompanied by cash or signed in person by the subscriber, counter-signed by the person soliciting the subscription and verified by the regular North American agent or carrier as a bona-fide new subscription.

All nominations, votes, subscriptions and requests for information must be sent to School Kinetoscope Contest, The North American, Philadelphia, Pa.

What the Prize Outfits Include.

Each outfit awarded as a prize in the competition will consist of one Edison school kinetoscope, equipped for use with current in the school winning the outfit; films to the value of $30, as selected from the Edison catalog; two lantern slides, embracing ten views each and accompanied by explnatory lectures; one dozen carbons for arc lamps; one screen, 4½x6 feet, and one portable miniature booth, as required by insurance regulations. The outfit has been selected with a view to giving an entertainment lasting one hour. The films are exchangeable for other Edison films at prices quoted in the catalog.

What the School Kinetoscope Is.

The Edison school kinetoscope is in every respect, except size, a duplicate of the standard motion-picture machine.

It can be packed in a case 16¾ inches long, 6½ inches wide and 10½ inches high. Its weight is about 20 pounds.

It uses non-inflammable film, projecting a picture 4½x6 feet on a screen 30 feet distant.

It can be operated by an intelligent boy or girl. The services of an experienced operator are not required.

It can be used wherever electric current is to be had.

Eighty feet of school kinetoscope film is equivalent to 1,000 feet of standard motion-picture film. The reduction of size of picture reduces the cost of film to users of the machine. Any film is exchangeable for another film of the same price at small cost.

There are 240 film subjects in the Edison catalog, any of which is obtainable in exchange.

The Edison school kinetoscope may be used as a stereopticon, and projects clear pictures 4½x6 feet from slides containing ten separate views. There are scores of subjects in the catalog of lanterns slides.

This is one way to solve the difficulty of equipping the schools with projection machines and it may prove a feasible one elsewhere. We would suggest, however, that instead of a special machine like the small Edison that can use only a special sized film to be procured only from that company that future prizes should be one of the regulation makes of projection machines that will allow the schools to use any of the ordinary makes of picture on the market. These cost somewhat more at the start but their value is infinitely greater.

THE WAR AND THE EDUCATIONAL PICTURES.

All parts of the world are in some way affected by the great European war. In the majority of instances the effects are for the time being disastrous, and while the general moving picture business in America is, as usual, good, there is no doubt that the educational branches are bound to suffer. It is well known that the greater portion of educational films came from France; now that those great factories are closed there must perforce be a suspension, not only of the films of studio and laboratory origin, but also of those being taken in all parts of the world by the educational film camera men. From the choice list of pictures already in our possession we know how a large company of photographers were abroad working upon the augmentation of that list in Scenic, Geographical and Natural History subjects. It is refreshing to note, however, that the continuation of the work is held in most hopeful anticipation.

War Specials.

We learn from England that a series of war specials are being snatched as it were like brands from the burning in the stricken Belgian districts. Tremonde and Malines have been filmed at great cost and risk by the Pathe firm, which are described in the English papers as "revealing poignant scenes besides which the newspaper descriptions are tame and insipid." Pictures of the ruins of both stately public buildings and the humble homes of the poor. Processions of the hunted refugees, as they trudge aimlessly, an endless train along the road. A special film shows the devastations of the great siege guns, terrible in their havoc and ruin.

The Making of a Soldier.

This is a contrast film showing the developments of Lord Kitchener's new army. Like the weekly instances depicted in Pathe's weekly these films cannot be considered as in any way violating the true American neutrality. They are history in the making, a record of current events, and more truely educational than the distorted, exaggerated and sensational newspaper accounts. Indeed, it must be admitted that any pictures coming from either the war zone or from the belligerent countries, on account of their truthfulness, must necessarily be less a violation of our determined neutrality than the excitable and indiscreet newspaper accounts.

Notes.

It is only to be expected that in Germany the foreign film trade is at a low ebb, with perhaps the exception of American films, from an educational standpoint this is a loss only to those who are thus deprived of these advantages. The moving picture is the universal language of the human family, and those who are deprived of its benefits are to be commiserated. This is especially applicable to the educational picture wheresoever it may be made.

* * *

Russia, in common with England, is maintaining an interest in keeping the moving picture houses open. It may therefore be worth while noticing that because of the taboo on German pictures "urgent demands are made for American films." Anglo-American agents are trying to meet the demand, travelling by Stockholm and Finland to Moscow.

* * *

Denmark finds the home supply of films insufficient and is sending out urgent calls for "almost anything now," noting that consignments via Liverpool to Copenhagen are shipped weekly. Reports from India show that it is yet a comparatively untried field. The war will naturally increase the interest and desire for European and American pictures. Until pictures descriptive in character secure their attention the demand in its small scale is for lurid melodrama.

BRITISH NOTES.

MOVING picture exhibitors in Britain have not yet succeeded in effectually removing the barrier to Sunday opening, but the past few weeks has seen much pioneer work in this direction. City authorities under whose jurisdiction licenses are issued remain in the majority inexplicably obdurate in their determination to prohibit Sunday exhibitions, although ordinary theaters controlled by the same body are given "carte blanche" permission to open their doors. It is highly probable that a great concerted move will shortly be started by the Exhibitors' Association to overrule this unwarranted obstinacy.

The experiences of the handful of camera operators who have succeeded in reaching the firing-line in Belgium teem with interest, but none more so than those of Frank D. Yates, of the Cherry Kearon Company, who has returned to London for a few days for breathing-time. He has secured sensational pictures of the battles and bombardments of Louvain, Bruges, Hasselt, Termonde, Malines, Alost and Aeoschot. When Antwerp surrendered Mr. Yates was at Ghent when suddenly the hotel waiter told him that the Germans were only just outside the town. Along with an American journalist he managed to sling his apparatus on the bare chassis of an automobile and the two of them made hasty tracks for Bruges. On the way they picked up a Belgian and an English soldier and a few moments later found they were being pursued by German mounted infantry. It was a race that would have made a thrilling scenario, but the car eventually outpaced the invaders, although it was hit five times. The first bullet hit the English soldier in the leg, the second lodged in the Belgian's thigh, the third let daylight into a suitcase, the fourth shattered the lens of Mr. Yates' camera and the last damaged a spoke in one of the wheels. Mr. Yates, who was holding like grim death to a splashboard, was unscathed and when Ostend was reached he found his films intact. In London Mr. Yates examined his camera and saw that the bullet after piercing the mount and casing had gyrated in the interior, reducing the mechanism to scrap.

"John D." in the United States is an abbreviation used to signify the monetary wealth of its possessor. In Gerrard street vicinity it implies the filmic wealth of the head of the Transatlantic Film Co. Mr. Tippett has sent me particulars of his recent visit to Holland whither he went to ease his mind that no Universal pictures were directly or indirectly going into Germany or Austria. His reason for this, it should be explained, is not solely patriotism. The British government imposes heavy penalties upon manufacturers trading with the enemy in any shape or form, directly or indirectly and, although the wares of the Transatlantic Film Co., Ltd., are entirely American and those of a neutral country the fact that they bear a British name and address, not to mention being incorporated as a British company, might precipitate an awkward situation if the regulations are not followed. On the return journey Mr. Tippett could see the shelling of Antwerp as they crossed the river Scheldt. The Transatlantic branches in Berlin, Vienna, Budapest are closed down until the end of the war, while the Paris office was closed temporarily after a bomb dropped from a German aeroplane missed it by a hair's-breadth. The offices in Barcelona, Petrograd, Moscow, Milan, Constantinople, Christiania, Stockholm and Amsterdam are still open.

Drastic parliamentary prohibitions have been introduced by the police in regard to film stores. Power is given to search any premises in which it may be suspected large quantities of films are stored. If no permit his been granted or if such stores are not known to the police the contents may be removed and confiscated.

Larry Trimble has just produced a fascinating little subject entitled "Film Favorites" in which Miss Florence Turner impersonates the most noteworthy film artistes of Europe and America. It is quite a novel production and a departure that is commendable for its originality.

Lieut. Rose, who has appeared in the role of a heroic naval lieutenant in several productions of the Clarendon Company, is in real life a lieutenant in the British Navy. He was aboard the cruiser "Hogue," which was sunk in the North Sea a fortnight ago. Fortunately he escaped inju.y.

A producing house that has loomed prominently before the public notice by the production of stage war dramas is the Samuelson Film Company. A year ago this organization was practically unknown but to-day they are responsible for some of the most profitable subjects. The attention of the firm is now being concentrated upon detective drama and the classic fiction of Sir A. Conan Doyle is to be exploited for this purpose.

PICTURE PLAYHOUSE OPENS OFFICE AT DALLAS.

The Picture Playhouse Film Company has opened a new office, located at 202 Andrews Building, Dallas, Texas, and has installed P. A. Block as manager. William J. Lee, general manager of the exchanges, has spent some time in Dallas arranging for the opening of this office and has already received a number of advanced bookings on the Picture Playhouse Film Company's releases.

UNAUTHORIZED QUOTATIONS.

Editor Moving Picture World,
New York.

Dear Sir:—It has come to our attention that a party by the name of H. R. Garson, of Troy, N. Y., has incorporated a company called the Exhibitors All Theater Film Co., and has issued a prospectus inviting exhibitors to take stock in such company. He offers to give them features for $15.00 per day, and among the films listed is "The Key to Yesterday."

This company has no connection with the Alliance Films Corporation, which has the sole rights to the Favorite Players' production, "The Key to Yesterday," and has no right to offer our pictures to anybody, at the preposterous price of $15.00, or any other price.

We would thank you to publish this letter in order that exhibitors may not be misled. Yours very truly,

ALLIANCE FILMS CORPORATION,
By Andrew J. Cobe, General Manager.

Complaint is also made that the Exhibitors All Theater Film Co. is offering the Cosmos feature "Lena Rivers" and the features of other companies at low prices without authority. Exhibitors generally are cautioned against giving credence to the quotations of the Exhibitors All Theaters Film Company.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Carpenter Chat.

THAT George E. Carpenter, of the Notable Feature Film Co., of Salt Lake City, shut us off the list a couple of weeks, so we begged him to put us back again and make our own job easier and he did and we're friends again with five issues all in a bunch. More than that, we wrung from him the confession that he writes vaudeville sketches and he wants to know if we are guilty, too. Worst we ever did was a burlesque show and two sketches. The show ran a season, but both sketch buyers died before the stuff could be produced. We are not superstitious, but we stopped writing after the second death.

George E. Carpenter.

He has switched from fables to "Secret Dispatches from the Front," as being more timely, being the letters of a Broadway Usher to the N. F. F. C. Office Boy. The Broadway is in Salt Lake City and not in the big town. Of course, the stuff lauds the subjects he is booming, but it does it so nicely that you read clear through the stuff (we lost an hour this afternoon) and are glad when you are through that you did read the stuff. Mr. Carpenter is one of the painfully few who realized that the best advertisement is the one that pays you in laughs or interest for reading the stuff clear through and who can frame his writing so that the laughs and booms alternate like a huge layer cake. The real secret of advertising is not to write stuff so strong that the boss likes it, but stuff so smart that it does the boss some good. There is a wide difference between the two, most times. What the boss thinks is good advertising just plain isn't—not meaning Carpenter's boss, but bosses in general, and you yourself if you write your own stuff.

One issue shows the front of a book sellers with three book rights plays advertised by posters and copies of the books. If you get it in time you can get your own stationer to do the same thing and carry a lot of your advertising to boom his wares. You can at least arrange to get a date within a couple of weeks and far enough in advance to get the shop-keeper to run an eight-sheet in his window with "copies inside." The meat of the whole scheme is right here in Real Reels from which we clip.

> Here is the idea: Hook up with your local bookseller, meet him half way and get in on the profits. He may tell you that he has not enough books with which to make an appropriate display, but that's easy. If you don't know the tricks of the trade we will let you in on a secret. The publishers invariably cover the backs of their books with paper covers and will send extra ones on application. You know a month or more ahead, just what you are going to get from your exchange. When you note that "The Call of the North," "The Squaw Man," "Brewster's Millions," "The Man on the Box," "The Virginian" or any other book play is scheduled, get busy.
> We know a man who made a great window display with ten books. He held the ten on his shelves and covered a miscellaneous lot of books with the paper covers and displayed them lavishly in the window. He sold the ten and "stalled" his customers on the other orders until he could get a shipment from the next town.

* * *

This idea of co-operation with the book store is not a new one, although, perhaps, it has not been tried in the West. In the East, however, book dealers are now providing moving picture theaters with slides while they devote a window display of books and one-sheet posters from the theater. The slides read something like this:

THE SQUAW MAN
Will Be Shown Here on Mon., Tues., Wed.
Read The Book.
Only 50c a Copy.
AT JONES' BOOK STORE.

As Mr. Carpenter points out, there are certain concerns that make a specialty of reprint, getting out cheap editions of the best sellers about the time the photoplay rights are sold, so your patrons may get the books for 35 to 50 cents instead of the $1.08 price. Try it.

And After That.

And after all that stuff comes this paragraph:

> If Epes Winthrop Sargent, of the Moving Picture World, does not pick on somebody his own size pretty soon, we will criticize his proof-reading.

If he can think of anything we have not already said on the subject let him shoot and we'll pay special delivery postage. We have already exhausted the Thesaurus and Crabbe's Synonyms.

And the Other Fellow.

And Paramount Pickings, Minneapolis, has also dropped fables for letters, the letters of an Exhibitor to his son. It's just a little too up-stage as written at present, though the idea is good. If they want to go that far back for inspiration they might pick on Pepys rather than Lord Chesterfield. More to the point is their clipping from the clipping in a local paper that reads:

> THE EFFECT OF THOSE WILD WEST MOVIES IS AWFUL
> Webster (S. D.) Reported and Farmer.—Wesley Kading, who is employed in a moving picture theater in Sioux Falls, arrived Saturday to spend a two weeks' vacation, shooting and visiting his parents and friends.

It is to be presumed that the parents were visited first and shot afterward.

Swagger.

The Lyric, Minneapolis, sends in a program for "The Typhoon." The five-act feature is not mussed up with a reel of comedy, but a musical program in keeping with the Oriental subject is used. Edith Helena and Domenico Russo were the soloists and there was also orchestral music. This is better than merely trying to make a certain footage and it assuredly appeals more strongly to those to whom the better class of plays will appeal.

We have seen little of the Saxe brothers' advertising of late. We wish that we might see more.

One thing we note is the front page, a clown standing before the drop curtain on which appears only the name of the theater. The clown is all in white, the printing being in green, save for his skull cap and the rosettes on his slippers, these being in red. It takes a wonderful restraint on the part of some one to have a red form and then use only a dab and two dots, but it is more effective than would be a whole smear of the color. The entire imprint does not cover the quarter of a square inch, but an entire square inch would have hurt it.

Wented.

Bertram Williams seems to have gone from Athens. The house owner and the exchange man say that he forgot to say good-bye or to hold other necessary conversation.

It Pays.

In sending in some stuff, Steve Farrar of the Casino theater, Eldorado, Ill., refers to a letter unanswered. Will he please repeat as we do not recall it. He sends a bill for Sterling's Love and Vengeance and writes:

> I enclose you a couple of bills, both of the ideas are old, but they got the business, and that is the main thing, perhaps they will help some other fellow in a small town. This Ford Sterling picture was run at my theater while I was away for a few weeks in June, the boys did not advertise it and the business was "nothing." I repeated it in September and filled the house. It pays to advertise when you have the goods to advertise about. I have a scheme in mind that I will try out as soon as I find a suitable film to try it on, that I think is original with me. If it's a success I will let you have it. Business is good.

Advertising assuredly does pay. No matter what you may have, unless you make a noise and tell others about it, you might as well rest content with small business. A good picture is a good picture no matter what the advertising, but a better than usual picture will not do you much good unless you let people know that you are going to have it. The bill, as Mr. Farrar says, is not a new idea, but it is good standard material and others may want to pattern after it.

> LOVE
> That is what caused FORD STERLING to sprinkle the race track in front of the racing automobiles.
> AND
> He succeeded in causing the machines to do a lot of funny stunts. Automobiles go backward and forward and sometimes sideways. They run over policemen and tear down fences. But you see Ford Sterling was looking for

VENGEANCE

Against the man driving racing car No. 2 and the way he got it will cause you to laugh as you have never laughed before. It's all a new kind of machine-made comedy, and what those skidding machines do is almost past believing.

The rest of the bill tells more of Ford Sterling and tells where the film will play. The above is the essential part.

A good catchphrase is found on the other bill. It will make good program filler. It runs:

LIVE EACH DAY SO THAT WHEN YOU DIE, EVEN THE UNDERTAKER WILL BE SORRY.

Stamps.

They must have a virulent attack of couponitis down in St. Louis. The St. Charles program comes in with the announcement that, with each ten-cent admission, on four days of the week, they will give a dollar's worth of stamps and half that number with five-cent admissions. On the back of the card is the menu of a Cafeteria with the whole week's bill of fare and there you can get a plate of roast beef and a trading stamp all for ten cents. From the form of the program we rather imagine that the same card is used both as a menu in the restaurant and a program in the theater, which is a new stunt on us. To be frank, it looks more like a menu than a program.

Not Too Economical.

We commented lately on a house that tried to get all of the opening announcement on one card. It was not a success. The Regent, Bogota, N. J., takes two cards, one a formal invitation done in neat Gothic. The other is the announcement card proper and a wise choice of type permits the saying of much in small compass. Three thousand of the announcement cards were sent out and about two hundred invitations. The two in combination work very advantageously.

Anniversing.

You'll look in vain in the dictionary for that word, but the Broad theatre, Bethlehem, Pa., has been anniversing, and to mark the anniversary went into a colored cover. The greeting is worded in particularly good taste, nothing blatant but a modest sense of achievement. To celebrate they had a feature every night.

A Richardson Record.

In sending in a program for criticism, Ed A. Saunders, of Edenland, Franklin, Tenn., writes that they have just completed a fourteen-day run without a break or a patch, thanks to good operating.

The program is badly printed. The body type is so old that it looks dirty on the page, and either the ink or lack of enough impression adds to this effect by printing grey instead of a strong black. The make-up, too, is ragged. It is all set the straight thirteen em column. If there is enough to run double column, that's the way it runs, but there is no uniformity. Monday's bill gets eleven inches of matter, while Tuesday runs twelve and Wednesday only one and three-quarters. Friday picks up to double column again. It would be better to lay out a certain space for each day and fill that space, cutting down long synopses and building up short ones. It may not be possible to get better printing in Franklin, but some little improvement can be gained by working to a uniform layout for program. Some of the subjects are discussed while others are merely passed over. It would be better to standardize the program space, using the same space for each day and writing to fill. That seems to be about all that can be done with the present printer. Later on a little house stuff would help. At present there is nothing beyond the announcement of the subjects. Mr. Saunders can find many references to good programs in this department. By sending to some of these managers, enclosing a stamped return envelope, he can gain many useful hints.

Just One Suggestion.

There is only one suggestion to be offered on the program of the Hollywood theater, Los Angeles. The day and date lines on the various sections of the program would be better in a bold type of the present size. They are not quite emphatic enough. The program is clean and attractive looking, the titles set in uniform type, the underlines being terse and snappy. The only foreign advertising appears on the back page. The printing is in blue on a light lemon stock. Everything about it gives the suggestion of a clean and well kept house.

Went It Alone.

Some time since we printed a request for sample programs from R. W. Hanke, of the Studio theater, Bridgeport, Conn., but there was no response, so he "went it alone." At that he did very nicely with it, marking the completion of the first year with his first issue. The stock is too heavy and of a shade of yellowish brown that suggests the grocery store. It is a good plan to use a tinted stock where it does not cost too much, but a light green printed in silk green, a light blue with ink of a deeper shade or some such combination would give a better result. Inside, in the program proper, too much bold type is used. The whole thing is set in bold faced type and this is not a good face for body type. A light italic or even a plain face would be better and would bring out the titles more strongly. As it is, there is the suggestion of too much to read and only the ardent fan, who is certain to come anyway, is apt to start to read it through. The type used in the announcement on the first page would do very well.

In announcing multiples, the number of parts should not be set in the same type as the title. It prevents the title from standing out. Give the title in eighteen point and either underline the number of parts or else cut down to eight point for the announcement of the divisions.

It is a good plan to omit quotation marks from the titles. This is not necessary where the title is displayed. It does not look well. In the body type, where a number of titles are quoted in succession there is another objection in that the excess of quotation marks does not make for easy reading.

The program reads convincingly and we think that Mr. Hanke has done very well indeed. The suggestions will make for even better results.

Many Treys.

There were more treys of hearts around the Princess theater, Peoria, Ill., the other day than can be found even in a pinochle pack. Seven thousand cards were used in the house and lobby decoration. Manager Johnston sends a photograph of the display, but it is too weak to reproduce well. The center of the lobby decoration was a trey of hearts in electric lights. This was surrounded by a circle of cards, only one card being used. Two cards were used for the second row, three for the next and so on, the effect being that of a gigantic umbrella without a handle. In front of this another web of single cards faced the street with another electric trey in the center, this being a flag spider web design. The same idea was carried into the auditorium. It was a decidedly novel effect and we regret that we cannot reproduce the photograph.

Pulled It Out.

M. Kashin, of the London theater, Montreal, after telling how much good this department had done him, adds that with precisely the same service plus an advertising campaign, the house has been worked over from a heavy loser to one of the best paying propositions in the city.

He sends several post cards of favorite players, backed by an advertisement and in announcing the Alice Joyce series, he makes cunning appeal to the lure of the stage with such lines as "Were you ever back stage?" "A show girl's adventures behind the scenes" and "See the whole series and know the comedy and tragedy of stage life."

An odd stunt is the distribution of a card with spaces for a male and female star. The recipient is invited to guess who these are who are to appear in the same subject on a certain day.

An adaptation of an old idea is a folder with the inside blank. The outside pages state that reasons for not coming to the London are to be found inside. Evidently Mr. Kashin believes in variety.

Prints, Too.

G. H. Rossiter, of Cheeks and Rossiter, owners of the Edgewood theater, Westville, Conn., sends in a lot of stuff which he explains is all done by himself on an 8-11 job hand press. Included in the lot is a collection of stock slides on "mica," which we gather Mr. Rossiter sells to other exhibitors as well. There are also numerous door-knob cards, blotters and other matters within the range of the press, some of them in two colors. The work is not at all amateurish, and the possession of a printing outfit puts Mr. Rossiter in an independent position with regard to his work. He does not have to wait while a big run is cleared from the press and he gets the display just as he wants it. Just in passing his mica burns suspiciously like gelatine.

It is odd that more managers, especially in small towns, do not own a small press. It is more than handy. Our own press is only 5-8, yet it does excellent work.

On Saturdays.

The Y. M. C. A. at Fall River, Mass., runs pictures on Saturday afternoon and evening, offering a program specially selected for them by a Boston woman, who seems to be making a specialty of this work. The advertising matter, prepared by H. E. Dodge, the general secretary, is reserved, but effective, and will draw as well as a more lurid style. Especially effective is an announcement card in blue on blue. It is all set in eight point except the headline, but it arrests attention.

Brief, but There.

Eugene A. Upstill, of the Star theater, Long Pine, Neb., has taken the plunge and sends in the first issue of his program. There is not very much to it, as yet, but what there is we like. It is a four page 5x7 done on rough white paper and printed in black. It is in no way pretentious but it has been set by a printer who knows how to get the best out of the type he has and it commands respect. Mr. Upstill's salutatory is in keeping with the typographical appearance, nothing florid, but somehow it impresses you with a sense of solidity and genuineness. About the only comment to make is that there should have been some sort of catchline over that announcement to set it off. We would like to see later issues, in which Mr. Upstill gets talking to his patrons, but other than this one addition to page three we do not suggest any changes. Read this over and see if you do not get the same impression of sincerity and on-the-levelness:

> I have made arrangements with the Film Exchange to get my programs one week in advance and I shall put out my week's programs every Saturday.
> My program is given me subject to change without notice, so I must make my program under the same conditions.
> I can inform you for sure of the program for the evening by 9 o'clock in the morning, my office being in the north rooms of the Hotel Upstill, phone 135.
>
> I can in no way hold the expensive service I am using over one night to be sure of advance programs.
>
> I am going to do my best to keep this program correct.
> Eugene A. Upstill, Proprietor.

If you cannot make the language jump through hoops, the next best thing is to be able to write sincerely. This initial greeting should be followed by a series of talks to the patrons and the back page can later be given to gossip of the players.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter, which should be addressed to this department. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will full manuscripts or synopses be criticised, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

At the Inquest.

POP HOADLEY was a welcome visitor to the last Inquest, this being his first appearance this season. Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice was also present, as were C. Doty Hobart, of the Kalem Company, and other staff men. Once again Marc Edmund Jones got into the limelight with an American two-reel picture, "The Ruin of Manley," and at his suggestion, the fact that he had written it was not disclosed until the comment was concluded. This was a written-to-order story, covering some stock negative of the Los Angeles flood of last year, and Jones explained that he had finished it off in a hurry and had not worked up to a good climax, falling back on mistaken identity. One point that was dug up was that a failure to be definite in the script had lost a point or else the director had not sensed the idea. The heroine sees, as she supposes, her fiance kissing another woman. She taxes the woman with it, and the latter explains it is her husband. As there was plenty of time to pursue the investigation further, the failure to do so constituted a fault, but Jones explained that the demand should have been made so aggressively that the other woman was angered and brushed past without further conversation. An Imp was rather severely handled because of technical faults and two places were pointed out where a great improvement could have been made with proper leaders. Nestor's "The Star Gazers" showed the results of lack of care in construction. The heroine was too selfish in her demand for a modish wedding gown and her general attitude toward her father did not seem to warrant her request for a fashionable costume when his business was selling peeps at the moon through a telescope. The suggestion was made that the picture was called "The Star Gazer" because he was looking at the moon. The end of the story led to a chat on the legal aspect. The heroine was charged with arson and the incriminating evidence had been turned over to the agent for the insurance company instead of to the prosecuting attorney, as would have been the case in real life.

A Crystal comedy, it was shown, could have been cut at the end of any one of several episodes without affecting the plot, since there was no plot to begin with. They just kept on repeating the business until a thousand feet had been run down.

Pop Hoadley said he had never seen the market so bad, and Marc Edmund Jones, in rebuttal declared that since he had come east he had canvassed the studios and had found a good market still for stuff above the average run. Continuing, Pop warned against the wildcats, declaring that much money was due him that never could be collected. He also told how some of the book rights stories were advertised for production before the rights were obtained and mentioned several specific instances.

Mr. Hobart called attention to the fact that Kalem wants only two-reel stories and reminded the authors that Kalem is playing largely for close up pictures.

In spite of the fact it was the night before election, there were thirty-two present. The next meeting will be held November 16, starting at the Savoy theater and adjourning to Keene's Chop House. The coroner intimated that if Jones had another two-reeler on exhibition on that occasion a change would be made to another house.

Here It Is Again.

We quote rather fully from a recent letter, partly because we believe that the matter should be kept aired as showing the methods of the schools and partly because others may make this same mistake. A correspondent writes:

> In reading the recent issues of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, I notice that you have a new film reviewer on the staff of your paper. This reviewer is the Reverend E. B. Stockton, S. T. B., of East Orange, N. J. As a reviewer, I think he is very good, and in fact, the only one I know of that regards minor faults in a production.
> I am one of the many readers of your Photoplaywright Depart and have been since I purchased my first copy of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, the January 3, 1914, number. I have read your many charges against the fake correspondence schools and have followed with interest your articles on the methods of graft used by these said schools. One of these articles particularly interested me, and that was the one concerning the "institution" which first offered its course in photoplaywriting for $30.00, then for $25.00, later for $22.50, and finally for the half price of $15.00! To me it seemed almost impossible that any school would offer or sacrifice its teachings for $15.00, and so I decided to investigate. As you did not give the name of this school, I was obliged to write to several before I located the one you had reference to. It was the Associated M. P. School of 672 Sheridan Road, Chicago. While looking through some of the circulars and advertising matter sent me by that school, I was surprised to find that it uses the name of Rev. Stockton as a proof of the merit of the school's teachings, being as Rev. Stockton is one of the graduates of the Associated. In the form of a testimonial, Rev. Stockton writes the following letter to E. F. McIntyre, director of the Associated:
> "East Orange, N. J.
> "Dear Sir: I have sold my scenario, 'The Thief,' to the Imp Company. REV. E. B. STOCKTON."
>
> I ask you to take nothing for granted. I am enclosing herewith the circular in which the above letter appears.
> Now, I find that Rev. Stockton is criticising scripts in addition to his reviewing films for THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. Furthermore, he uses the same worded advertisement you used when you were doing the same thing. Since you are so prejudiced against the correspondence schools, I wish to have you answer this question: When a man takes a course in photoplaywriting and succeeds in writing salable plays after completing the mail order course, can you recommend him as a worthy successor to you when it comes to criticising MSS for amateurs?

When Dr. Stockton started in to learn to write photoplays, he undertook the course of this Chicago school and also came to this writer. We did not know at that time that he was studying with the school.

He wrote the script titled "The Thief," sent it to the school and brought it to us. We suggested sending it to the Imp. He did so, and sold the story for $15. Later the school replied in criticism and told him that no director would "touch the story with a ten-foot pole." Having already sold the story, he decided that he wanted no more of such "schooling," and so he discontinued the course. Later on they wrote and asked why he had stopped and he told them. They promptly announced that one of their "pupils" had sold a script. He has sought to have this misuse of his name stopped, but the Post Office authorities profess their inability to prevent it and his only other recourse is an expensive litigation in a foreign state.

Dr. Stockton is not a "graduate" of the Associated Motion Picture Schools. They are using his name without his authority and very much against his wishes. He is a personal pupil of this writer and a competent critic, not by virtue of the school, but by virtue of his own intelligence and good instruction.

Lamothe Moving.

New Orleans is without a Coroner. Julian Louis Lamothe has moved on to the studio belt and has hitched up with the Melville section of the Lubin company in Los Angeles.

There is an opening in New Orleans, if anyone wants it, for an Inquest.

That Philadelphia Inquest.

If the Philadelphia Coroner does not come across with his address already requested, we will endeavor to appoint another Coroner. Last call.

Books Wanted.

We would like copies of Katterjohn's and Nelson's books on playwriting to fill out our set. If you have a copy of either and are willing to sell, please drop a postal, stating price. Do not send the book, as we want only one copy of each.

No More Dogs.

One week from date no more dog stories will be read. We have read nearly three hundred and to the faults already described in an earlier issue, we have added another writer who, in writing a story about a dog, adds twlve small puppies.

There is not more than one writer in a hundred who writes with the brains God gave him. He just writes any old thing and spends most of his time wondering why it does not sell.

Buying photoplays is a business, not a charity scheme, and only good plays will be purchased. If you cannot write good plays do not expect to sell them. Don't even try to sell until you get started or you'll merely waste postage and patience.

To Get Notice.

If you want to be listened to sign your name. The office is holding a synopsis right now for a chap who did not even have the courtesy to sign his name while asking for a free criticism. If he will send a stamped and self-addressed envelope, he can have it back. Under no circumstances will this department read synopsis either free or for a fee. It just plain cannot be done.

Evenly Good.

You can work up to the finest climax to be imagined and if your story is not good, you'll lose out. Too many writers think only of their climax and think that so long as that is good the rest of the story doesn't matter. It does. If in the first half the reel you get the spectator thoroughly disgusted with your leading character, the best and strongest climax in the world is not going to make good. If your sweetly gentle heroine knowingly and deliberately commits bigamy along about the six hundredth foot, you can't hold the interest to her clear to the tailpiece; yet that is precisely what a chap did the other day and he thinks he has a strong story.

The whole trick in writing a hit lies in getting and holding the interest of your audience. Make them want a thing to happen because they are interested in the person it is to happen to, and then make them fear that quite the reverse is going to be the climax. To get and hold the interest, all parts of the story must be equally good, and the strong climax alone is not sufficient. You might weep with Muriel mourning over the body of her dead sweetheart, but if you saw her deliberately get drunk and kill him in her maudlin rage, you could not share her sorrow. If she inherited the alcoholic taint, you might be sorry for her affliction, but if she gets drunk through sheer cussedness and kills Jack, that is another matter.

Hundreds of scripts are spoiled largely because the appeal is broken long before the story ends; because the leading character forfeits all sympathy. The author has not learned to scrutinize every aspect of the story, and so he blunders along to the important climax that caused him to start the story and never realizes that in his engrossment in the big thought he has cost the character all possible interest and so the climax that might otherwise score leaves the audience apathetic.

Until practise brings you to the point where you can write with an absolutely certain touch, examine every action, study both cause and effect and see just how the development will affect the interest of the man who sits before the screen. If you'll do that, you may not write so many stories, but you'll write much better ones.

Night Scenes.

One of the things we noticed in the dog stories recently submitted was that fully fifty per cent. of the scripts had night scenes. We do not see why this should be so, but it is, and it gets very tiresome to take script after script and wring its neck just because of the night scenes; not because it is not possible to make night scenes, but because it is so seldom necessary. Play your stuff in the sunlight and the pictures, made in the sunlight will be convincing, but even tinted night stuff is so seldom convincing that night stuff should be used sparingly. Write night scenes only when Friday falls on the thirteenth of the month.

Gypsies.

Gypsies cut but an infinitesimal part of the everyday life of Americans, and yet they are constantly introduced into scripts "because they are so picturesque." That's no reason at all. They are not really picturesque and they are not convincing.

Another Study Method.

Building up on the scheme of studying pictures on the screen, one author mentally translates the action into words. He sees, for instance, a proposal. He repeats the action and gets a mental scene something like this:

> Parlor—Nell sitting on sofa—Maid enters—speaks—Nell speaks—Maid exits—ushers in Paul—maid exits—Paul goes to sofa—shakes hands with Nell—sits beside her—talks—takes her hand—proposes—she says yes—he puts ring on her finger.

He has repeated the action as it happens and gets a good mental picture of what the script should look like. But he is apt to get too full a script. It might, deduced to actual words, look more like this:

> Parlor—Nell on—Maid announces Paul—he is ushered in—greets Nell—sits beside her—proposes—accepted—gives ring.

That is probably about what the director would need. He would know, for instance, that the maid would not linger after having ushered the caller in, and so, though the exit is not indicated, he would send her off while Paul was crossing to Nell.

The scheme has the advantage of giving the precise action, but it gives the action and does not leave room for observation of the finer points. It would be well, perhaps, to select a program repeated twice in an evening and the second time note the more important matters of technical construction. The latter is the more important of the two, though it is, of course, highly necessary to be able to write understandable action.

Weighing Letters.

Don't buy a cheap spring balance to weigh your letters on. Wait until you can afford three dollars for a regular beam scale that may be relied upon and then get one of a standard make. The springs are not reliable and the scripts that seem to weigh two ounces may be two and a few grains over, some clerk weighs it, slaps on a postage due stamp, the studio refuses it—as most studios do nowadays—and you get the script back some time later from the dead letter office unless you put a return card on the going envelope—and very few seem to do that.

Old Plots and New.

Someone asks why we suggest that the beginner work on many new plots instead of working on a single one until that is right.

There are two excellent reasons. One is that working on a single plot the writer, and most particularly the novice, is apt to grow stale. The second, and vastly more important reason, is this: The foundation of photoplay writing is the ability to plot. It is better to write a hundred plots and get a vague idea of their errors than to write one single plot a hundred times. Each time a new plot is worked out it presents some new angle. It is probable that in a hundred plots this same angle may present itself in a dozen stories. It is better to get the angle a dozen times in as many lights than to study the angle always from the same point of view.

Few are possessed of sufficient patience to study plotting and the writing of single scenes. They want to get right down to writing and selling plays, but this merely extends the time required to find success for this work must be done, no matter how clever you are, and if you complicate it with the writing of full plots, you merely do that much extra work while performing the required duty. You are not getting ahead; you are merely working overtime.

N. Y. M. P. Supplied.

Richard V. Spencer writes:

> By the way, we (the N. Y. M. P. Co.) are overstocked and will be for some time to come. We have more than 40 scripts ready for production in addition to those already in the directors' hands. It will take a very good story to tempt us for the next two or three months—if then.

It takes the exceptional story to sell to almost any company these days, but Spencer wants even better than the best if he buys.

An Editor Now.

A. Van Buren Powell is now the editor of the Colonial Company. He is not one of those automatic self-advertisers, but he built up a sound technique and now he is collecting money for it.

Objection Sustained.

Henry Albert Phillips takes exception to a recent comment on his new book in which we said it was not a book for the novice. He writes:

> I have just read your notice about my new book, "The Photodrama," and I want to thank you for the kind words you say about it—which I know would not have been said unless you meant it. I want to take friendly exception, however, to several things you have said. For one thing, you say in one place that "Mr. Phillips advances little that is new," which seems roundly contradicted first by "The newness of his idea starts from the cover" and again "it is not a rehash of any other work, but original in treatment and thought."
> Secondly, I object to the statement that "Mr. Phillips has not written a book for the beginner." If you had substituted the word "illiterate" for "beginner" I think it would have been better. This much I will cheerfully concede, that your own excellent work, "The Technique of the Photoplay," is better for beginners than any other work written, beside being one of the three or four books distinctly worth while for the most advanced playwright as well. But "The Photodrama" begins with the A, B, C of the new art, because it represents all I have learned of photodrama in the simple order that I acquired the knowledge myself.
> One difficulty that beset me in writing this book proved to be my opportunity: Everything that had been written to date seemed to be a rehash, a revamp or a rebate of your own, "The Technique of the Photoplay;" if I have done something different, I feel that my effort has not been in vain. I want to confess here and now that I owe a big debt for the valuable information and ideas gleaned from "The Technique of the Photoplay." The pioneer's is the hard work after all.
